

CHAPTER FIVE

BACTRA IN A REGIONAL CONTEXT

Introduction

This chapter places Bactra in the larger region of Bactria, Sogdiana, Margiana, and northwestern India from the Iron Age to the Kushano-Sasanid period. I examine broader patterns in Central Asia and in turn show how Bactra fits into those patterns. Whereas in Chapter Four internal evidence was used to reconstruct the ceramic sequence of the site, Chapter Five seeks to establish regional parallels in order to contextualize those trends. By examining ceramic assemblages and sequences from a selection of sites, I show broadly where and how the ceramic phases and transitions of Bactra parallel, or are distinct from, developments elsewhere. This necessitates a discussion of the major problems associated with defining relative ceramic horizons and assigning absolute dates to them. In this respect, several implications arise about what pottery informs us about far-reaching cultural and historical trends as they relate to each of the six ceramic phases of Bactra. As a result, special attention will be given to the relationship of Stack-fired Ware to Achaemenid occupation; the nature of Hellenistic period Bactra compared to Ai Khanoum and the overall “Greekness” of Bactra; the impact of the Nomadic period on material culture; the vibrant growth of Kushan ceramic traditions; and the movement towards ceramic standardization under the Kushans and Kushano-Sasanids.

I first briefly introduce a selection of the major, well-published archaeological sites in Central Asia with important ceramic comparanda, organized by region.¹⁴⁷ I then return to the ceramic phases of Bactra. For each phase, I examine parallels drawn from selected sites and discuss the larger framework of problems and implications. Our historical and chronological knowledge of the Achaemenid and Hellenistic periods, which comprise Bactra Ceramic Phases I and II, is more complete than our knowledge of the Nomadic, Kushan, and Kushano-Sasanid periods, corresponding to Bactra Ceramic Phases III-VI. This fact, along with the striking nature of the ceramic transition from Phase I to Phase II, allows for more a comprehensive analysis of these two phases than any of the others.

Regional Sites with Ceramic Comparanda

By examining the Bactra ceramics alongside those from sites elsewhere in Central Asia, it is possible to offer suggestions about long-term patterns of similarity and difference. These patterns in turn have bearing on our diachronic understanding of the cultural and economic mechanisms that operated in Central Asia during the epoch under investigation. Twenty-three regional sites form the basis of this study, which, following a brief introduction, are arranged by location (Figure 576) and chronological significance.¹⁴⁸ I discuss seven sites in Bactra, ten in Sogdiana, one in Arachosia, two in Gandhara, and three in Margiana. Table 20 provides a list of the sites and their chronological relevance.

¹⁴⁷ For a mostly comprehensive list of sites in Afghanistan with accompanying maps and bibliography, see: Ball, Warwick. Archaeological Gazetteer of Afghanistan. Catalogue des Sites Archéologiques d'Afghanistan. Paris: Editions recherche sur les civilisations, 1982. Published in 1982, it is not up to date, but there have been few new excavations, although some of the bibliographies have been substantially expanded. Rachel Mairs' 2011 bibliographic text provides good introductions to the literature of some of the important sites in modern Uzbekistan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Pakistan. The most detailed publication on ceramics of Eastern Bactria is remains Bertille Lyonnet's 1997 publication. While the focus is on Eastern Bactria, she collates comparanda from across Central Asia.

¹⁴⁸ It is beyond the scope of this project to provide a comprehensive list of all, or even most, comparanda of the Bactra ceramic corpus. Rather my purpose is simply to present a general overview that can point to broad trends and patterns. Lyonnet 1997 is a useful reference for comparanda distribution.

Bactria

1. Cheshme Shafa, about 20 km south of Bactra, lies alongside the Balkh River and is strategically placed just north of a major mountain pass across the Hindu Kush. Although it is a large site that potentially could have held a substantial population, major excavations were begun only in 2008 by DAFA and have thus far only uncovered a small area of Islamic occupation lying directly on top of a small Achaemenid occupation, with some evidence of Kushan or Kushano-Sasanid remains as well.¹⁴⁹ At present it is not possible to ascertain the chronological or geographical extent of its occupation. The DAFA excavators, however, suggest two large occupations, in the Achaemenid and Islamic period.¹⁵⁰

2. Emshi Tepe and its small satellite town and necropolis, Tillya Tepe, are most famous for the rich Kushan era tombs, excavated by Victor Sarianidi in the 1970s, but the ceramic material reaches from the Iron Age to at least the Kushan period.¹⁵¹

3. Surkh Kotal, known for its large temple site, was excavated primarily by DAFA's Schlumberger and is largely Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid. Although known best for the so-called Rabatak Inscription, ceramic finds have also been published.¹⁵²

¹⁴⁹ Olivier-Utard, F. Politique et archéologie: histoire de la Delegation Archéologique Française en Afghanistan (1922-1982). Paris: Editions Recherches sur les Civilisations, 1997. The French Archaeological Delegation in Afghanistan (DAFA) was founded in 1922, after an agreement between the French government and the soon-to-be king Amir-Aman Allah Khan of Afghanistan. The original agreement gave DAFA exclusive rights to archaeological research for thirty years and allowed them to bring half of the artifacts discovered, with the exception of precious metals and jewelry, back to France. Alfred Foucher, the first director of DAFA, conducted surveys in the first years of DAFA before turning to several large-scale excavations. World War II ended the monopoly France had over archaeological research in Afghanistan, but DAFA continued to conduct many large scale and influential excavations until its closing in 1982. With the re-opening of DAFA in 2002, Bactra again became an excavation priority, but security has not allowed as much freedom of movement and research as was possible before the 1982 closure.

I was able to partially analyze the Achaemenid pottery from the site in 2011, but the data I have is not sufficient for statistical comparison with Bactra.

¹⁵¹ For the purposes of this overview, I treat these two places as a single site. Although these two sites are only 500 meters apart, they are frequently not accurately shown on maps, to such a degree that many would think they are unrelated. Note Hiebert, Frederik, Kohl, Philip, and Simpson, St.J. Barrington Atlas. Map 98 (1:1,000,000), 2000. Tillya Tepe is placed ca. 6km WNW of Emshi-tepe. For Tillya Tepe, see: Sarianidi, V. 4. Chaqalaq Tepe, in eastern Bactria, was excavated by a Japanese team in the 1960s and has material dating from the Hellenistic through the Kushano-Sasanid periods and likely later.¹⁵³ Although many of the absolute dates from Chaqalaq Tepe's 1960s excavations have been recalibrated based on new numismatic research, their relative ceramic sequence still remains useful.

5. Dilberjin, also in eastern Bactria, has two large phases of occupation, the first in the Achaemenid period and the second in the Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid periods.¹⁵⁴

6. Djiga Tepe, close to Dilberjin, was excavated by Pugachenkova with the Soviet-Afghan Archaeological Expedition in 1974 and 1976. The citadel at Djiga Tepe has been dated to the Hellenistic through Kushano-Sasanid periods, although there are debates about the ceramic dating.¹⁵⁵

7. Ai Khanoum is arguably the most important site for comparative Hellenistic material in Bactria. Excavated by DAFA in the 1960s and 70s, this site is famous for changing scholars' perceptions of Hellenistic Bactria.¹⁵⁶ The site shows evidence of Greek institutions such as the theater and gymnasium, as well as high quality dining vessels and transport amphorae with direct Mediterranean connections. Some of the ceramic evidence has been published and re-evaluated several times.

Sogdiana

Southern Sogdiana is one of the best-excavated areas of Central Asia and contains a number of sites important for understanding the history of Bactra's ceramic traditions and in turn the role that Bactra played in the development of Central Asian ceramics. Here, I discuss ten sites in Sogdiana.

8. The Kurganzol Fortress, excavated by Yakubovskii and Masson briefly in the mid-20th century and more recently by Sverchkov, provides evidence from the late 4th to mid-2nd centuries BCE (as dated by the excavators) and is remarkable in part for having almost no later material covering the deposits of these periods.¹⁵⁷

¹⁵⁶ Ai Khanoum is one of the most researched and referenced sites in Central Asia and has an extensive bibliography. The earliest publications are the excavation reports, published in two separate series by DAFA. A very helpful introduction to the varying natures of these reports can be found in Fussman, G. "Southern Bactria and Northern India before Islam: A Review of Archaeological Reports." Journal of the American Oriental Society 116, no. 2 (1996): 243-259. Since the first wave of publications, Bertille Lyonnet and Jean-Claude Gardin (to a lesser degree) have continued to study and reassess the ceramics. For the most recent discussions of Ai Khanoum chronological issues, see: Lerner, Jeffrey D. 9. Derbent, also called the Iron Gates (the site in modern Uzbekistan, not Azerbaijan), has Achaemenid and Hellenistic remains.¹⁵⁸

10. Termez and Kampyr Tepe both lie along the Oxus and are well excavated and well published. Termez has no documented Achaemenid material, but there was likely Achaemenid period occupation in the hinterlands. Originally excavated by a Soviet team in the 1930s, the majority of the published material comes from a joint Uzbek-French project, which began excavating in the 1990s.¹⁵⁹ The project focused on the three main hills, revealing small portions of a deeply buried Hellenistic city and a large Buddhist monastic area. At this time, Termez is most illuminating for its Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid period material. Though the Hellenistic era material from Termez and Bactra is similar in shape and decoration, it is the most poorly excavated period at both sites.¹⁶⁰

11. Kampyr Tepe appears to be a modestly sized garrison town established during the Seleucid period and abandoned sometime during or shortly after the reign of the Hellenistic Colonies of Samarkand-Marakanda (Afrasiab II-III) and Ai Khanoum (Northeastern Afghanistan)." Anabasis: Studia Classica et Orientalia 1, (2010): pp. 73-75.

¹⁵⁹ Large portions of the site were used as a truck depot during the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Most of the site is situated on what is still a military base.

MAFOUZ puts out many preliminary reports of the ongoing excavations at Termez, among them: Mission archéologique franco-ouzbègue de Bactriane septentrionale : Rapport 12 (2004); Leriche, Pierre, Pidaev, Sakirdzan Rasulevic, Monik, Kervran, and Kazim, Abdullaev. Kanishka in the mid-2nd century CE.¹⁶¹ The flow of the Oxus has cut through a large portion of the site, but the unspoiled walled town has well preserved housing remains that, due to the small amount of soil covering them, have been largely exposed.

Excavations have been small-scale, but carefully recorded, and the numismatic material is quickly cleaned and read along with the ceramics.

12. Takht-i-Sangin, also along the Oxus, but further east, is likely the original site of the Oxus Treasure, primarily a collection of 5th - 3rd century BCE gold objects.¹⁶² The site itself was excavated by Soviet archaeologists in the 1970s and revealed a Hellenistic period temple and occupation remains through at least the Kushan-Sasanid period.

13. Dal'verzin-tepe was fully occupied from the Hellenistic period through the Kushan period, but was in decline in the Kushano-Sasanid period.¹⁶³ Excavated by both Russian and Japanese teams, the ceramics are most relevant for the Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid periods.

14. Further north in Sogdiana is the capital city of Afrasiab/Marakanda, currently excavated and studied by a French/Uzbek team. The pottery of Afrasiab, which is well-preserved from the Hellenistic through Kushano-Sasanid periods, has been studied extensively and published by Bertille Lyonnet.¹⁶⁴

15. Kok-tepe, a neighbor of Afrasiab, has a large Iron Age phase, and while originally excavated by a Soviet team, much of the pottery has been re-organized and presented by Bertille Lyonnet.¹⁶⁵

16. Jandavlattepa is currently being excavated by a small Czech/Uzbek team, who has the stated goal of publishing all finds within five years of excavation. Thus far the team has excavated several areas of the site, revealing large Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid era deposits.¹⁶⁶

17. Excavated by Soviet teams in the 1970s and 1980s and part of a large, current Czech/Uzbek survey project, Dabilkurgan has large Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid era deposits.¹⁶⁷

Arachosia

18. South of the Hindu Kush, Kandahar has material dating from the Achaemenid period through the Islamic period. Excavated by the British Archaeological Institute of Afghan Studies, the ceramic finds are most important for the Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid periods, which show similarities with the Bactra assemblage.¹⁶⁸

Gandhara

19. Southeast of Kandahar in Gandhara (modern Pakistan) is the site of Taxila, which has yielded important remains from the Achaemenid and Hellenistic to the Kushan periods. The site was extensively excavated by John Watson Marshall in the 1920s, revealing large grid lined housing areas and monumental architecture.¹⁶⁹ The ceramic finds have been well published and reveal many similarities to material further north.

20. Charsadda, the capital of Gandhara from the 6th century BCE to the 2nd century CE, was inhabited from at least the Iron Age through the 7th century CE and, like

Bactra by Phase, Parallels and Implications

This section proceeds chronologically through the available comparanda for the six ceramic phases proposed in Chapter Four. I first introduce the relevant sites, followed by a brief synopsis of the Bactra ceramic assemblages and a discussion of the implications for dating. Finally, I examine distribution and regional and cultural implications based on comparisons with the sites discussed above. For Phases I and II, we see the different effects of the Achaemenid and Hellenistic periods; for Phases III and IV, we see ceramic continuity despite changing political regimes; for Phases V and VI, we see the development and standardization of new traditions.

Iron Age/Achaemenid/Early Hellenistic: Bactra Ceramic Phase I

Relevant Sites

Yaz Tepe II and III are important for understanding this Iron Age assemblage. The more recent excavations of Ulug Depe are especially useful for determining the cultural significance of this pottery. Comparanda for the Bactra Phase I assemblage have been found at Cheshme Shafa, Emshi Tepe/Tillya Tepe, Dilberjin, Kurganzol, Derbent, the Termez hinterlands, Takht-i-Sangin, Afrasiab, Kok Tepe, Kandahar, Taxila, Charsadda, and Merv.

Bactra Assemblage

Ceramic Phase I is characterized by a preponderance of Stack-fired Ware, a repertoire of large storage shapes and few small table vessels made in self-slipped Peach Cream fabric (Figure 577).¹⁷⁵ There are very rare instances of matte red paint on bowls and parallel, incised lines on hole-mouthed jars (see Chapter Four, Table 14 and Figures 558-560, pp. 435-439).

Implications for Dating

Bactra Phase I has bearing on our understanding of regional relative phasing, and this phasing has implication on the beginning occupation date of Bactra. In Chapter Four I suggested an absolute date range of late Iron Age to the Hellenistic period for this ceramic phase, or roughly 650/500-315/275 BCE, but the beginning date could be significantly earlier. It is helpful to briefly consider the Bronze Age.

¹⁷⁵ Bronze Age Central Asia had a robust wheel-made tradition using Peach Cream fabric and firing style, or something very similar. Stack-fired Ware, made with the Peach Cream fabric and firing style, perhaps represents the unbroken use of firing technology, but it is distinctive from earlier assemblages of shapes made in Peach Cream fabric found at other sites. Altyn Tepe, excavated by Masson, has a well published ceramic repertoire in Peach Cream fabric. See Masson, V. M. Altyn-Depe. Translated by Henry N. Michael. Philadelphia: The University Museum, 1988.

Similar to the Phase I Stack-fired Ware at Bactra, this assemblage contains several beakers, a thickened rim jar, and small bowls—more than are typically found at Bactra. The museum dates this to the 6th and 5th centuries BCE. Author’s photo.

The type-site for Iron Age ceramics (including pre-Achaemenid Iron Age as well as Achaemenid Iron Age) is Yaz Tepe in the Merv oasis of Margiana. Viktor Masson and Viktor Sarianidi established the Yaz chronological sequence in the 1950s.¹⁷⁶ The tripartite Yaz relative chronology has been reassessed several times and the three phases have been associated with a range of absolute dates within the Iron Age, normally considered to be 1500-330 BCE in Central Asia.

Yaz I material follows the Bronze Age Peach Cream-like, wheel-made ceramic tradition, but most consists of handmade geometric painted vessels. In Yaz II-III there was a revival of the Peach Cream fabric wheel-made tradition much like Stack-fired Ware, but the distinction between phases II and III has not been duplicated satisfactorily at other sites.

There is ample evidence of the handmade Yaz I ceramic tradition in Bactria, Margiana, and southern Sogdiana, including at sites in close proximity to Bactra. Only a handful of these distinctive, geometric painted sherds have been found at Bactra, and Phase I deposits lack residual ceramics from earlier periods, implying that they did not exist, at least in the excavated areas.¹⁷⁷ The evidence at Bactra supports the notion of a relative date of Stack-fired Ware beginning after the handmade-painted tradition and continuing long after.

One of the main questions is whether or not Yaz II or III can be associated with either the “Median” or Achaemenid periods.¹⁷⁸ In their 2005 article on the chronological sequence of Ulug Depe in Turkmenistan, Boucharlat et al. discuss some of these problems and ultimately propose that the ceramics most closely resembling the Yaz II and III assemblages are “pre-Achaemenid” and likely “pre-Median.”¹⁷⁹ They put forth as part of their evidence for an early date the lack of identifiably Achaemenid material in these early layers. The “eggshell” ceramics in surface scatters are in fact the only ceramics that they have identified as Achaemenid in date.¹⁸⁰ Among their so-called “pre-Achaemenid” ceramic assemblages are a number of thickened, rolled, or pinched rim carinated storage jars and carinated beakers—some of the most typical vessels in the ¹⁷⁷ Excavations did not go deep enough to reach virgin soil, which would provide the best evidence for the earliest occupation. But if such earlier occupation existed, one would expect residual forms.

¹⁷⁸ Associations with the “Median” period are made primarily farther west than Bactria, particularly at Ulug Depe, and are problematic.

¹⁷⁹ Boucharlat, Remy, Henri-Paul Francfort, and Olivier Lecompte. “The Citadel of Ulug Depe and the Iron Age Archaeological Sequence in Southern Central Asia,” Iranica Antiqua vol. XL, pp. 479-514, 2005.

¹⁸⁰ Ibid. pp. 492. There are no examples of eggshell ware at Bactra, certainly not of the type described in: Fleming, David. “Eggshell Ware Pottery in Achaemenid Mesopotamia,” in Iraq Vol. 51, pp. 165-185, 1989.

Bactra Ceramic Phase I Stack-fired Ware assemblage. This so-called lack of identifiable Achaemenid ceramics precludes the possibility of thus far unknown Achaemenid shapes or styles.¹⁸¹ This is a circular problem. Not knowing what Achaemenid period pottery outside the capital looks like and presuming that anything that does not contain such examples is pre-Achaemenid does not allow for the possibility of a thus-far-unknown Achaemenid assemblage. Bactra Phase I speaks to this problem. The overlap of the Peach Cream firing technology of Stack-fired Ware and the shape repertoire of the Hellenist ceramic traditions indicates a use period of Phase I Stack-fired Ware definitively placed in the Achaemenid period. Although this does not negate the possibility that Stack-fired Ware was produced earlier than the Achaemenid period, it does open the door to dating these vessels found elsewhere to the Achaemenid period despite the assemblage's lack of "typical" Achaemenid shapes.

Distribution and Regional and Cultural Implications

Regional parallels exist for a number of Bactra Phase I vessel shapes. Carinated lower walls in a variety of fabrics have been found in Bactria and Sogdiana and are sometimes dated to the Bronze Age, albeit with different bodies and rims than later carinated jars. Perhaps this represents a regional shape preference.¹⁸² Thickened rim, rolled rim, and pinched rim jars in Peach Cream fabric have a number of parallels, albeit with some slight variations in color tone and vessel proportion. Among other places, they appear at Afrasiab, Ulug Depe, the Kurganzol fortress, and Ai Khanoum. Again, there is some variation in color tone and vessel proportion (Figures 578, 579). Carinated beakers have also been found in a wide distribution pattern, appearing in the Termez area, Afrasiab, and Merv, though not usually at sites south of the Hindu Kush. Rare examples of beaker shapes have been found at Charsadda and graves in the Swat valley, but they are not made in Peach Cream fabric and are usually intricately decorated. There are some parallels for small bowls, though as at Bactra, these are likely closer to the later part of this phase.¹⁸³

The comparanda indicate that during the use period of Phase I ceramics, Bactra occupied the central-southern portion of a region of shared ceramic material culture.

This region includes Bactria, Sogdiana, and the eastern part of Margiana.¹⁸⁴ Stack-fired ¹⁸³ Given the simplicity of the shape, they are also difficult to definitively assign to a period without seeing their surround assemblage.

¹⁸⁴ The precise western boundary is unclear.

Ware is the defining feature of this shared material culture and, despite subtle differences in color tone and vessel proportions, it is made with similar techniques on the wheel and is stacked and fired with what can only be similar intent of appearance and shared methods of attaining the self-slip cream color. Lyonnet discussed this wheel-turned fabric and firing style throughout Bactria, stressing that the standardization of forms and sizes was an important factor in stacking vessels in the kiln, which allowed for the consistent manipulation of surface color.¹⁸⁵ This standardization seems to be specific to each production area. Subtler distinctions of direction of influence and origin of shape and formation techniques are impossible to determine at this point.

If Stack-fired Ware was produced prior to Achaemenid rule, the continuity of the fabric, firing technology, and shape range would imply very strong regional traditions and a distinct lack of Achaemenid influence on ceramic production. If the shape range was introduced along with the Achaemenid conquest, the implication would be that the Achaemenids exerted enough control over craftsmen to effect a swift change in the repertoire of shapes, but not fabric or firing. This conclusion hinges on whether or not the rise and continuation of this tradition was contemporaneous with the Achaemenid conquest and rule over this region. Although this cannot be definitively answered in this study, there is enough evidence to suggest a pre-Achaemenid beginning date of Stack-fired Ware and a continuation through the Achaemenid period.

With either of the two chronological possibilities—that the Stack-fired Ware predates and continues throughout Achaemenid rule, or that it begins with Achaemenid rule and continues throughout—we are still left with a ceramic tradition that is homogenous and widespread in Central Asia, but one distinctly different from the ceramic traditions of Persepolis or Pasargadae in the Achaemenid heartland, which included many high quality tulip bowls and eggshell bowls.¹⁸⁶ Whether there was a strong local tradition that survived during the Achaemenid period or the homogenous shape repertoire was imported at the behest of the Achaemenids, we must account for this difference of assemblages.

If we place Phase I partially in the Achaemenid period and trust the historical sources that tell us that Bactra was the satrapal capital during the Achaemenid period, we can say that despite its political status, Bactra retained an overwhelmingly local material culture, at least in its ceramics, and that foreign influence on this material is only seen after the Macedonian conquest. This evidence speaks to broader issues of the strength of certain local cultural traditions as well as an administrative style of the Achaemenids that produced so little change in ceramic culture.¹⁸⁷ Although rare examples of typical Achaemenid forms such as the tulip bowl have been found at some sites in Bactria, Sogdiana, Margiana, and more frequently, Gandhara, these shapes have not been found at Bactra.¹⁸⁸

Mediterranean to Central Asia. More narrowly, several important sites for understanding the local context and role of Bactra in the Hellenistic period are Ai Khanoum, Afrasiab, Termez, Kampyr Tepe, and Merv. In addition, a large number of other sites also provide ceramic parallels. Although neither its ancient name nor its political significance is known, Ai Khanoum is the best published site with Hellenistic era remains, and its pottery has been the subject of many studies. Afrasiab/Marakanda also has a well-known ceramic sequence, but there is much debate over the existence, duration, and date of one or two possible abandonment periods in the Hellenistic period, which causes difficulties for fine grained dating and comparative study of its ceramics. Comparanda are also found at Chaqalaq Tepe, Djiga Tepe, Kurganzol, Derbent, Takht-i-Sangin, Dal'verzin Tepe, Kandahar, Taxila, and Charsadda.

Bactra Assemblage

Ceramic Phase II is characterized by the sudden abundance of diverse, small table bowls, the relatively rapid decline in production of Stack-fired Ware and the introduction of the new Pink/Buff A and Pink/Buff B fabrics, the growing use of red slip, and a greater diversity of coarse fabrics in a variety of short and pinch neck shapes. (see Chapter Four, Table 15 and Figures 561-563, pp. 440-446).

Implications for Dating

The presumed foundation date of Ai Khanoum has changed since the site was first excavated in the 1960s, when it was thought to be a foundation of the late 4th c. BCE. Today, scholars now place its founding at the latter part of this period, correlated with the co-regency of Seleucus I and Antiochus I (292-281 BCE). There is no evidence for a hiatus in occupation at Bactra, so I would expect that the pottery phases of Bactra just before those that align with the first phases at Ai Khanoum do date to the late 4th and early 3rd centuries—presumably when Bactra was under Greek rule and Ai Khanoum was not (if it was even occupied at all).¹⁸⁹

The earliest levels at Ai Khanoum contain some large storage vessels and table vessels in Peach Cream fabric, which is associated primarily with Phase I at Bactra. If there was no significant residual material or trade with the West before the reign of Antiochus I at Ai Khanoum, then this material would correspond to the early 3rd century. This suggests that Bactra Ceramic Phase II, distinguished primarily by the gradual disappearance of Stack-fired Ware and the increased popularity and diversity of table vessels, began in the early or even mid-3rd century BCE, or shortly after the founding of Ai Khanoum. If, however, there is significant pre-Hellenistic material at Ai Khanoum, represented by the Peach Cream fabric vessels present there, then it suggests that Phase II at Bactra could indeed have an earlier date, perhaps as early as the late 4th century BCE. The evidence at hand does not allow a definitive answer.¹⁹⁰

One of the most important, lynchpin ceramic types for providing absolute dates in Graeco-Bactrian Central Asia has been the moldmade bowl, many examples of which have been found at Ai Khanoum and Afrasiab, but, interestingly, not at Bactra. Usually hemispherical in shape and with relief decoration on the exterior created by forming the bowl in a ceramic mold on a wheel, these are very distinctive and recognizable, even in small body sherds. Produced at various sites around the Mediterranean, there is ample and high quality research on the absolute dates of these bowls. Susan Rotroff has suggested a beginning production date of 224/223 BCE, but cautions that they did not become popular immediately, perhaps not for a generation or more.¹⁹¹ She concludes that the height of their popularity in the Mediterranean begins ca. 180 BCE. Although there is disagreement about how long it took for specific ceramic styles to travel from the Mediterranean to Central Asia, the presence of moldmade bowls has been used to provide absolute dates at several important sites, including Ai Khanoum and Afrasiab. Interestingly, not one fragment of a moldmade bowl has been identified at Bactra thus far.

¹⁸⁹ It is unclear, however, how much residual material from earlier occupation there is at Ai Khanoum.

¹⁹⁰ The French excavators identify the earliest material at Ai Khanoum in a construction fill in the Heroon of Kineas (Lyonnet 2012 pp. 146-147), but the excavators were unable to find any evidence that would produce an absolute date. I think that it is reasonable to believe there is some residual Achaemenid material in the first phase of Ai Khanoum pottery, but many of the small shapes definitely belong to the early 3rd century BCE.

Another shape that is typically considered a marker of Greekness, although not as elite as moldmade bowls, is the fishplate. Of the few fishplates that have been found at Bactra, there seems to be a bimodal size distribution of ca. 15cm diameter and ca. 30cm diameter.¹⁹² This bimodal distribution is also present at Ai Khanoum, and has some potential for more fine-grained dating: the larger examples at Ai Khanoum are thought to be later.¹⁹³ There are not enough examples at Bactra to demonstrate the same pattern, though the Ai Khanoum findings are suggestive. Incidentally, most of the fishplates at Bactra are in Gray fabric, implying a close relationship between the fishplate form and Gray fabric.

Kampyr Tepe has a well-established ceramic chronology for the Seleucid through early Kushan periods and will prove useful for determining fine-grained dates for Bactra ceramics when more stratified deposits have been excavated. Kampyr Tepe, Merv, and Termez all have small amounts of Gray table vessels, and some fragments of moldmade bowls have been noted at Termez.¹⁹⁴

Distribution and Regional and Cultural Implications

The transition from Phase I to Phase II is the most drastic of those at Bactra and the most visually distinct until the rise of glazed pottery in the Islamic period. Although Phase II encompasses most of the Hellenistic period, there is unfortunately no evidence from Bactra that allows for secure and refined absolute dates. It is possible, however, to see parallel ceramic assemblages during the Hellenistic period at a number of sites in Central Asia and certain specific shape parallels throughout Central Asia, the Near East, and the Mediterranean.

The transition from an assemblage of primarily Stack-fired Ware to a more diverse assemblage with a wide range of fabrics and small table vessels extends from Bactria and Sogdiana to parts of Margiana. In addition to stylistic changes, there are major functional differences between the Phase I and Phase II ceramic assemblages that imply distinct changes in dining behavior. Entirely new fabrics come into use and Peach Cream fabric drops out completely. Pink/Buff A and B become the most common fabrics, but Orange and Gray are also frequently found. Elsewhere in Bactria and Sogdiana, gray fabrics are more common.

An even wider region is delineated when including areas that had any type of known, previous assemblage that then developed a diverse range of typical, small, Hellenistic table shapes. This wider region extends westward from the Hindu Kush and covers the Near East and the Eastern Mediterranean, or, broadly speaking, the Hellenistic political sphere.¹⁹⁵

The absence of high quality Greek-style sympotic vessels in the Hellenistic era assemblage at Bactra is very important because it speaks to the extent of Greekness in culinary practices. It is not possible to address fully the degree to which elements of Greek city planning, language, religion, culture, or ideology existed at Bactra; there is simply not enough archaeological evidence at this point and very little written material. But from the abundant ceramic materials we can look at the range of shapes not present and suggest possibilities for what the absence might mean. Of the typically Greek shapes and styles seen at some sites in Central Asia, Bactra does not have evidence of the decorated, high-footed kraters, kylikes, moldmade bowls, closed lamps, affixed decoration (until later), or high quality black gloss that have been found at Ai Khanoum in large numbers and more rarely at Kampyr Tepe and Merv. There is also no evidence of transport amphorae, or indeed anything that could be used to transport liquids long distances. One interesting lacuna of more locally popular forms in the Bactra ceramic assemblage is the lack of any tall, vertical rim goblets with small external ridges. These vessels, probably Central Asian in origin, appear to be quite common in Hellenistic period ceramic assemblages at Ai Khanoum, Afrasiab, and Merv, and present but not as popular at Kampyr Tepe or Termez. This could indicate that Ai Khanoum was in greater contact with Afrasiab than with sites further south.

Lyonnet characterizes the Hellenistic era pottery of Afrasiab as poor, saying “typical Hellenistic shapes like fish-plates and bowls with inturned rims are present, but the lack of variety and the very casual finish of the vessels, except for red slip and polishing, let us suppose that it was rather made for military garrisons than for the population of a Greek colony.”¹⁹⁶ Bactra II could be characterized in a similar manner: there is a lack of high quality table vessels, and the decoration is admittedly basic. However, the pottery of Bactra I is also lacking in high quality table vessels and there was almost no decoration to speak of, so it speaks to a continuity of quality and character, if not form, function, or style. To attribute these characteristics to the needs or demands of a garrison population does not account for what happened to the earlier population of what we know to be a large city.¹⁹⁷ With respect to high-quality Greek style vessels, the assemblage at Bactra is in line with most other Bactrian sites. The numbers and quality of the vessels seen at Ai Khanoum, rather, is the outlier in Bactria.

I suggest instead that the pottery suited the demands of a population that did not greatly value the quality of the ceramics associated with the recently introduced dining traditions. Rather, the functional aspects and the fairly basic decoration techniques were sufficient.¹⁹⁸ Thus the Phase II ceramics show a distinct change in dining customs that seems to correlate with the advent of Macedonian control. But this need not indicate the presence of a large number of Greeks, and the lack of elite Greek ceramics is conspicuous. Perhaps the strong forces that so quickly transformed the long-held ceramic traditions of Bactra derived from changes in agricultural supply and foodstuffs trade. Or perhaps there were new methods of asserting political authority, thus far invisible at Bactra.¹⁹⁹ The current evidence does not allow definitive answers.

¹⁹⁷ The ceramics at Jebel Khalid garrison provide an interesting parallel in two ways: 1. Greek shapes were copied by local producers at first, then basic forms of decoration appear, but are not high quality and 1. there was a lack of high quality Greek style sympotic ware, which the excavators attribute either to the use of metal vessels or drinking activity that took place outside of the excavated houses. Jebel Khalid is a garrison site, which would seem to support Lyonnet’s characterization of military sites, but there are other factors to consider that may be more important, including the cultural and ethnic makeup of each city, which is a poorly understood factor. Jackson, Heather and Tidmarsh, John. Jebel Khalid on the Euphrates. Vol. 3, The Pottery. Sydney: Mediterranean Archaeology, 2011.

The Bactra ceramics imply very different styles of rule or occupation between the Achaemenid and Hellenistic empires, for while the former did not affect ceramic traditions, the latter changed them completely, so that within approximately a century of the Macedonian conquest almost every ceramic form present in the Achaemenid period dropped out of use. Entire categories of vessel shapes like individual serving bowls and amphorae that were not seen in the Achaemenid period at Bactra become commonplace and remain so through to the Islamic period.

Nomadic/Early Kushan: Bactra Ceramic Phase III

Relevant Sites

Sites relevant for this period include Termez, Afrasiab, Dabilkurgan, Dilberjin, Dal'verjin Tepe, and Merv. Comparanda is also found at Chaqalaq Tepe, Djiga Tepe, Kampyr Tepe, Takht-i-Sangin, Kandahar, Taxila, and Charsadda.

Bactra Assemblage

Ceramic Phase III is characterized by the growing popularity of table amphora forms, the continuation of small curved-walled bowls with a growing variety of rim forms, and the introduction of several new shapes and decoration elements. This phase sees the introduction of pedestal-footed goblets.²⁰⁰ At this point eggplant colored slip begins to be used alongside red slip, both in matte and semi-glossy styles (see Chapter Four, Table 16 and Figures 564-566, pp. 447-452).

Implications for Dating

Our historical knowledge of the Nomadic invasions of Bactria is poor. Scholars debate where the new Nomadic peoples came from, the exact date and duration of their campaign, and the nature and effects of their overthrow of the Graeco-Bactrian kingdom. French excavators at Ai Khanoum were very sure about the date of the Nomadic invasion—146 BCE—and it was relatively widely accepted, but their evidence has been increasingly questioned. Lerner has suggested that the population of Ai Khanoum was producing a type of red slipped, net-pattern relief decorated bowl into the 1st century BCE. This technique was an import from the Mediterranean, which supports the notion of a Greek population in communication with the Mediterranean remaining at Ai Khanoum through the 1st century BCE, thus significantly down-dating the ceramic sequence and occupation.²⁰¹ Due to the differences in ceramic assemblages, the evidence at Bactra does not resolve any of the absolute dating problems of the Nomadic

Stylistic changes occurred between Phase II and Phase III, but these cannot necessarily be aligned with the overthrow of the Graeco-Bactrian kingdom by nomadic tribes. Greek occupation discontinued at Ai Khanoum, but there might be a substantial squatter phase. I have suggested an end date of the mid-1st century BCE for Bactra Ceramic Phase II. This encompasses the final Greek occupation phases at Ai Khanoum and its likely squatter phases and allows for the possibility that the Mediterranean-influenced ceramic traditions persisted through the first century of Nomadic rule.

Distribution and Regional and Cultural Implications

The pedestal-footed goblet is a major new shape innovation in Bactria and Sogdiana, and there are similar forms in India in ceramic and metal.²⁰² Lyonnet has suggested that the pedestal-footed goblet, or gobelet à piédouche, along with the handmade bottle shape and tripod vessels, can be used as ethnic markers of Nomadic tribes. Bactra has only one of these shapes, the pedestal-footed goblet. Not only is the evidence not clear, but it is difficult to associate clearly link ethnicity with ceramic types, especially with the dearth of evidence available in this area. Whatever the geographical origin of this vessel type is, it becomes popular in Bactria and Sogdiana as well as in areas south of the Hindu Kush, especially Gandhara, in the post-Hellenistic era, showing a slight shift or expansion, of the zone of shared material culture.

Eggplant colored slip becomes popular as well in this period at Bactra and other sites, including Termez, Afrasiab, Dabilkurgan, Dilberjin, Dal'verzin Tepe, and Merv. It is used most frequently on serving dishes and amphorae, often combined with pattern burnished decoration. The black gloss slip that was common in the Hellenistic period at other sites is sometimes cited as a predecessor of eggplant colored slip, but the connection is not so clear-cut. Bactra itself does not have a tradition of using black-gloss pottery, either locally produced or imported. However, the potters of Ai Khanoum did commonly use black gloss pottery in the Hellenistic period and it has been found at Termez and Kampyr Tepe, so it is a possible model for this eggplant colored slip. Yet it is equally likely that instead of a Mediterranean influence, this slip instead mimicked late Han period black/dark gray lacquer-ware from China or Northern Black Polished Ware from South Asia.²⁰³ More important, however, is what adoption of a typically Mediterranean, Chinese, or South Asian decoration mode meant to the people producing and using eggplant colored decorated vessels at Bactra. I suggest that this form of decoration was not an ethnic marker, but rather it was an aesthetic adaptation and adoption.

Ceramic Phase III shows continuity from Phase II in many shape groups, both in function and style. There is no evidence that food ways changed drastically, but perhaps there were slightly different drinking customs. The pedestal-footed goblets can be held with one hand, unlike many of the small bowls that could be used for liquids, which are too wide in circumference to hold comfortably with a single hand. What we do not know about this historical period is enormous. There does seem to be a smooth transition in ceramic traditions, but it is difficult to extrapolate any other solid evidence that might illuminate chronological or cultural trends in this period. Like certain architectural elements, such as Corinthian column capitals, that once imported were permanently adopted, Mediterranean/Greek pottery forms became local adoptions, a trend seen later in the Kushan period. This does not necessarily mean, however, that we can continue to associate them with Greeks.

Middle Kushan: Bactra Ceramic Phase IV

Relevant Sites

The most useful sites for understanding this phase are Dilberjin, Djiga Tepe, Termez, Jandavlattepa, and Kampyr Tepe. Comparanda are also found at Emshi Tepe/Tillya Tepe, Surkh Kotal, Chaqalaq Tepe, Takht-i-Sangin, Dal'verzin Tepe, Afrasiab, Dabilkurgan, Kandahar, Taxila, Charsadda, and Merv.

Bactra Assemblage

Ceramic Phase IV sees a continuation of many small table bowls, but most of the slanted-walled small bowls drop out of use. The rims of table amphorae become more embellished, as do some platter rims. There is a greater variety of pedestal-footed goblets, many with decorated and grooved feet, and these become quite popular. A popular plate form, R143, is also introduced. Pattern burnishing and incised styles become very common on table vessels. Eggplant colored slip becomes as popular as red slip, and on amphorae and pitchers, vertical burnishing on the neck is the most popular decoration. Incised decoration begins to be commonly used on large sloping-walled bowls, a technique that becomes more popular and complex in Phases V and VI (see Chapter Four, Table 17 and Figures 567-569, pp. 453-457).

Implications for Dating

Bactra Phase IV cannot greatly contribute to solving the many dating problems about the advent of the Kushans in Central Asia, although I have suggested that the beginning of the phase likely occurs relatively near the rise of Kushan hegemony. The numismatic dates of the Kushan period in Bactria are more secure than they were several decades ago, but Bactra does not have enough numismatic evidence in known contexts to address any regional dating problems.

Distribution and Regional and Cultural Implications

Many of the patterns seen at Bactra are borne out elsewhere. These patterns include the continued production of pedestaled goblets and many small bowl forms. These regional trends do not seem to indicate any large changes in food ways, although the pedestaled goblets might show a continuation of the slightly changed drinking culture that occurs during the Nomad period. In Bactria and Sogdiana, the shallow, slanted-walled small bowls become less common and deep bowls more common, as does a very flat plate form. This does not necessarily indicate a change in foodstuffs, but perhaps in dining habits. The popular, pattern burnished designs, like the eggplant slip, are found throughout Bactria, Sogdiana, and Margiana, except for in the Upper Surkhan Darya region, where there are similar shapes and slips, but no burnished decoration.²⁰⁴ They are also found further south in Kandahar, Charsadda, and Taxila, although with different patterns. This variability has the potential to tell us about regional and micro-regional trade patterns.

The Kushan period is at other sites associated with architectural decoration that is distinctly aesthetically Hellenistic in inspiration, but local in flavor—such as Corinthian column capitals with Buddhas or elephants seated in the acanthus leaves.²⁰⁵ The rise of Gandharan art also probably happens around this time, pointing to a period of syncretism and complex interactions and influences, but the avenues and mechanisms of influence and exchange remain largely elusive.

Late Kushan/Early Kushano-Sasanid: Bactra Ceramic Phase V

Relevant Sites

The most relevant sites for understanding Bactra Phase V are Dilberjin, Djiga Tepe, Termez, Afrasiab, Jandavlattepa, and Kampyr Tepe, which is important for its established final occupation date and lack of Bactra Phase V parallels. Comparanda are also found at Emshi Tepe/Tillya Tepe, Surkh Kotal, Chaqalaq Tepe, Takht-i-Sangin, Dal'verzin Tepe, Dabilkurgan, Kandahar, Taxila, Charsadda, and Merv.

Bactra Assemblage

Ceramic Phase V sees the growing popularity of large open slanting-walled bowls with complex pattern burnished and incised decoration. It also sees the rise of a vertical rim plate with highly standardized production in terms of fabric and slip quality, size, and decoration. This is easily the most common form of this period and provides the advantage of being largely diagnostic even in body sherds. This high quality standardized production is a hallmark of this period (see Chapter Four, Table 18 and Figures 570-572, pp. 458-462).²⁰⁶

Implications for Dating

Although I have suggested a range of dates that encompasses the end of the Kushan period and the beginning of the Kushano-Sasanid period, the absolute dates of this ceramic phase are not at all secure. Like most of the phase transitions, changes in this phase are primarily stylistic. One shape that has the potential to provide decent dates is the vertical rimmed plate. Standardized in fabric, decoration, size, and shape, these vessels are found throughout Central Asia and with more research could turn into

Distribution and Regional and Cultural Implications

The vertical rim plates have a wide distribution pattern throughout Central Asia. Stančo has suggested a production and use date of the mid-3rd to mid-4th century CE and although they have been compared frequently to Roman table vessels and terra sigillata, he finds no direct evidence of a Mediterranean origin or inspiration.²⁰⁷ The pattern burnished decoration of this period is a distinctly Central Asian form of decoration that also frequently appears on large open platters as well as amphora necks. The distribution of some of these platter forms in Bactria, Sogdiana, and Margiana includes the distribution area of vertical rim plates, but extends into Gandhara and is seen at Charsadda and Taxila. Pattern burnishing, common on these platter forms, still does not appear in the Upper Surkan Darya area.

It is not known what leads to the rise of vessel standardization in this phase, nor why only a few vessels are standardized. These vessels do not show any great change in function, but perhaps the popularity of decorated, large open platters and standardized individual dining vessels is a marker of a more scripted dining activity than had existed before. It is tempting to associate this rise in standardization and whatever changes in production organization and technology that allowed it with the beginning of the Kushano-Sasanid period, but there is no solid evidence to support such a contention, and it could easily have another origin. What does seem clear is that this standardization becomes more common in Phase VI, with both the vertical rim plate and the hemispherical bowl, possibly indicating a Sasanid origin.

Kushano-Sasanid: Bactra Ceramic Phase VI

Relevant Sites

The most useful sites for understanding Bactra Phase VI are Termez, Jandavlattepa, Afrasiab, and Merv, but comparanda are also found at Surkh-Kotal, Dilberjin, Djiga Tepe, Takht-i-Sangin, Dal'verzin Tepe, Dabilkurgan, Kandahar, Taxila, Charsadda, and Merv.

Bactra Assemblage

Ceramic Phase VI sees the rising popularity of several important forms, including a carinated hemispherical bowl that is easily the most popular table form of this period and is likely related to the earlier vertical rimmed pattern burnished plate. The large open slanting-walled bowl form, R124, which usually has rope shaped handles, becomes very popular. This form has the aforementioned register style rim and becomes decorated with increasing complexity and diversity. This phase is characterized by the preponderance of standardized forms, both the continued and declining vertical rim plate, R144, and the carinated hemispherical bowls, R164 and R165. Red and eggplant colored slips continue to be used on table forms, but the standardized forms tend to be largely red slipped (see Chapter Four, Table 19 and Figures 573-575, pp. 463-467).

Implications for Dating

This phase is even less secure than Phase V in terms of absolute dates. Although Bactra cannot contribute any compelling evidence for an absolute date, there is enough evidence to suggest that the second standardized shape, the carinated bowl (in both squat and tall forms) begins after the start of the vertical rimmed plates, although they are used concurrently after that.

Distribution and Regional and Cultural Implications

The distribution of the hemispherical bowl, the most popular shape of this phase, is similar to that of the vertical rimmed plate. Interestingly, neither the hemispherical bowl nor the vertical rim plate is found south of the Hindu Kush, perhaps indicating a shift in orientation away from northern India. Both these forms are normally slipped red, but the bowl is occasionally fired an eggplant color, which does not seem to have been a desirable trait on the vertical rimmed plate. In general, red slip becomes more common at this time, a trend paralleled across the Near East, the Roman Mediterranean, and South Asia.²⁰⁸

It is the more local shapes, the large open platters with embellished incised and pattern burnished decoration that tend to be slipped more frequently in the eggplant color, and these styles do extend south of the Hindu Kush, in a distribution pattern similar to that of the earlier pedestal footed goblets popular.

Significance

The popularity of standardized vessels in this period, both regionally and at Bactra, could signal more stringent rules and conditions for performing social status, or perhaps be indicative of more efficient regional trade networks. Either or both of these possibilities could have dovetailed with changes in workshop technology and scale. The different distribution zones of the standardized plate and bowl versus the decorated platters is perhaps indicative of several different regional trade networks, but their origin or significance is unclear.²⁰⁹

Conclusions

Phase VI seems to show the end of the character of pottery that shows any traces of Mediterranean influences and tastes. In the following periods, unslipped vessels are more common, usually decorated with incised and cut-out surface treatments. The Sasanid amphora shape with knobbed handles is ubiquitous. This trend of unslipped amphorae and utility shapes continues into the Islamic period, while glazes later become a ubiquitous form of decoration for table vessels.

Comparison of the ceramics from Bactra with other sites in Central Asia places Bactra firmly in shifting zones of shared ceramic culture. Before and during the Achaemenid period, Bactra is in a larger zone broadly contained within Bactria, Sogdiana, and Margiana, though the western boundary is more permeable. In the Hellenistic period, Bactra is in a large zone of shared small dining vessels and serving vessels that appears throughout the Mediterranean, the Near East, and Central Asia. Bactra does not have elite Greek-style vessels and seems to adopt the function, but not the highly decorated styles of Hellenistic pottery, unlike Ai Khanoum, which seems to be an outlier. Although the Nomad invasions certainly changed the political authority in Bactria and Sogdiana, there does not appear to be a large break in material culture, but rather the addition of certain vessel types such as pedestal-footed goblets, either a Nomadic or Indian addition. Beginning either during the Nomad period or at the beginning of the Kushan period, the zone of shared culture between Sogdiana, Bactria, and Margiana, spreads to south of the Hindu Kush. The growth of high quality decoration and embellishment during the Kushan period shows a vibrant and inventive craft-making community. In the late Kushan and Kushano-Sasanid periods, the high quality standardized vessels found in Bactria, Sogdiana, and Margiana do not appear south of the Hindu Kush, yet some of the other highly decorated platters and pattern burnishing as a decorative form do, perhaps indicating that Bactria and Sogdiana are part of several different expanding and contracting zones of trade or material influence.

CHAPTER SIX

CONCLUSIONS

Contributions and Summary of Results

This project has analyzed pottery from Bactra in order to create a usable fabric and decoration overview, shape typology, and ceramic chronology for the material dating from approximately 600 BCE to 500 CE. This has necessitated an investigation of the patterns of use as reflected in Bactra's material culture as well as an understanding of the position of Bactra in its larger Central Asian context.

Fourteen distinct ceramic fabrics have been identified, five fine fabrics and nine coarse fabrics. Many of these were likely used in local production, especially Peach Cream, Pink/Buff A, and Pink/Buff B. Many decorative techniques were identified, including slips and paints, incised patterns, and pattern burnishing that exhibit changes through time. The fabric and firing style used at Bactra during the Achaemenid period, Peach Cream fabric with a self-slip, appears to be made with the same techniques as were used in the Bronze Age. This represents a long-running tradition of consistent wheel and firing technology, although it was used to produce a different shape repertoire that I have called Stack-fired Ware. The Hellenistic period ushers in a range of new coarse and fine fabrics, dominated by Pink/Buff A and B, that are used and refined until the Kushan or Kushano-Sasanid period, when we see a remarkable standardization in the high quality, fine style of Pink/Buff fabric.

In my analysis of approximately 18,000 diagnostic sherds, I identified 177 rim/upper profile types and 40 base/lower profile types, each with an expected range of fabrics, decorations, and rim or base diameters have been identified. Along with a wide range of large utility jars and cooking vessels, there is a great variety of small dining vessels and a rich tradition of serving vessels, including amphorae and large decorated platters. With some exceptions in the Hellenistic period assemblage, Bactra presents a similar repertoire of shapes as many other sites in Bactria and southern Sogdiana, yet markedly different from Ai Khanoum.

Using dendritic clustering techniques, co-occurrence frequency analysis, and multi-dimensional scaling, a relative chronology of six ceramic phases, each with three subphases was created. Primarily using ceramic comparanda from regional sites, each ceramic phase was given approximate absolute dates ranging from ca. the 7th/6th centuries BCE to the 5th century CE. While this chronology remains to be resolved and fine-tuned with further research, it provides a useful foundation for future scholarship and a basis for beginning to explore larger trends in ceramic use and meaning.

Overall, the ceramic material of Bactra reveals a city with strong local traditions and a vibrant craft tradition from its earliest major occupation period, probably in the 7th or 6th century BCE, through the 4th century CE. The Achaemenid era material is similar to what is seen throughout much of Bactria, Sogdiana, and Margiana at this time and is markedly different from ceramic traditions of the Achaemenid heartland in modern Iran. This probably indicates a great difference in dining and social habits.

The Hellenistic era ushered in a wealth of new shapes and decorative techniques, but Bactra does not exhibit evidence of importing or producing the high quality Greek-style sympotic vessels seen at Ai Khanoum. Instead, the ceramic repertoire found at Bactra shows the adoption of many of the new vessel functions, but the retention of local decorative styles.

The invasions of the Nomads in the mid-2nd century BCE did not immediately change the character of the pottery, nor does there seem to have been any destruction or break in occupation at this time. The consolidation of Kushan hegemony is contemporary with a vibrant and diverse ceramic production at Bactra that becomes more standardized and of higher quality in the Kushano-Sasanid period.

In the Achaemenid period, Bactra shares in a regional ceramic tradition that is very distinct from those in the Near East or the Mediterranean. In the Hellenistic period Bactra begins to share in the broader tradition of red-slipped table vessels that occurs throughout central and western Eurasia. During the Nomadic period, the ceramic traditions of Bactra begin to diverge from those in the Mediterranean and become more aligned with regional shaping and decorative traditions.

The most substantial contribution of this dissertation is making the full ceramic corpus of these periods available and providing a chronological framework. Although the recent Bactra excavations are unpublished at this juncture, with the exception of several articles and short preliminary reports, the ceramic corpus is large enough to be valuable even without solid contextual information. The long period of occupation combined with the high ceramic density allow this corpus to be a potentially useful tool for the study of Bactrian pottery.

Lacunae

The analysis and results presented in this dissertation would have been improved by better access to field notes and stratigraphic data, specifically, concordances that would connect ceramic lots with soil deposits and cultural activity. Petrographic analysis of the fabrics might have revealed shared technology or trade with sites in southern Sogdiana, where a large amount of petrographic analysis has been conducted in recent years.

While I have been able to access and research many Central Asian sites and publications, I have not had similar success with the Chinese material and cannot adequately discuss the similarities or differences of the Bactra corpus and ancient Chinese ceramics.

Future Directions

Our understanding of the Bactra ceramic chronology would be improved by further excavation; well-recorded sondages in Tepe Zargaran would allow for greater certainty and further refinement or correction of the chronology presented here. Further excavation of other sites in Afghanistan would conceivably have as much positive effect on our knowledge base as the recent years' intensive research in southern Uzbekistan, but seems unlikely given the current political climate. A possible solution would be the full publication of all material in the National Museum of Afghanistan and in the DAFA compound. The ongoing joint project by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago and the National Museum of Afghanistan to register every object in the museum has the potential to accomplish this task. Hopefully at some point this registry will become available online and allow scholars to integrate evidence from Afghanistan in a way not currently possible.²¹⁰

There is a large amount of unpublished ceramic material at sites both North and South of the Oxus River as well as a number of publications without sufficient detail for proper ceramic comparison. More adequate funding might allow a change in this trend. A fundamental difficulty is the accessibility of publications from former Soviet Russia and the former Soviet Central Asian republics, but the rising popularity of academia.edu is beginning to have a positive affect on this problem. It is becoming de rigueur for younger scholars in these regions to immediately upload copies of published papers, conference papers, and well-illustrated PowerPoint documents to this website shortly after they are produced.

Foreign troops are drawing down and, as of 2014, there are technically no more combat operations, but as the spring fighting season begins in 2015, many areas of Afghanistan are struggling daily with crippling poverty, intense violence, and the threat of terrorists' political agendas. Although it would be understandable for any further work in archaeology and cultural heritage to be abandoned, the employees and scholars of the National Museum of Afghanistan, Kabul University, and the Afghan Institute of Archaeology are unflagging in their efforts to protect and properly research their heritage. With this study, I have earnestly tried to provide but a small tool for their capable hands.

APPENDIX C

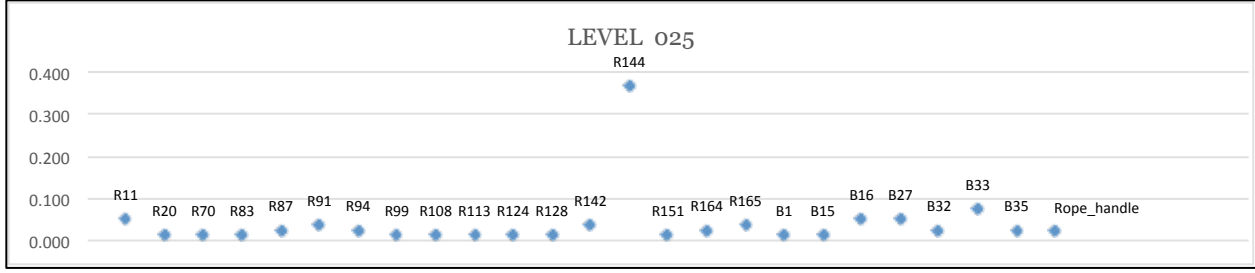

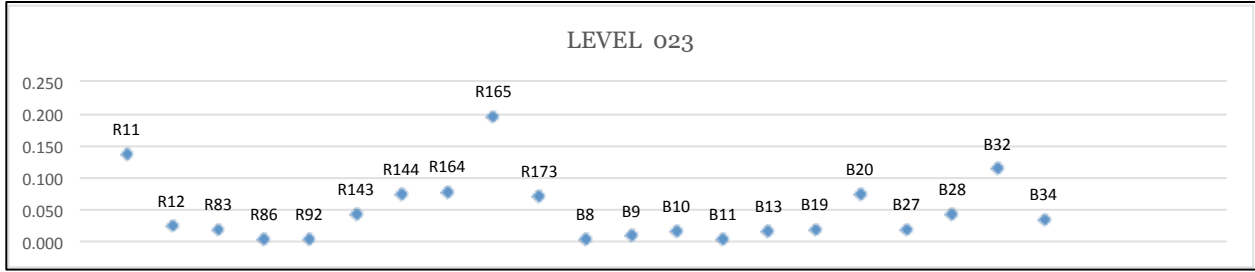

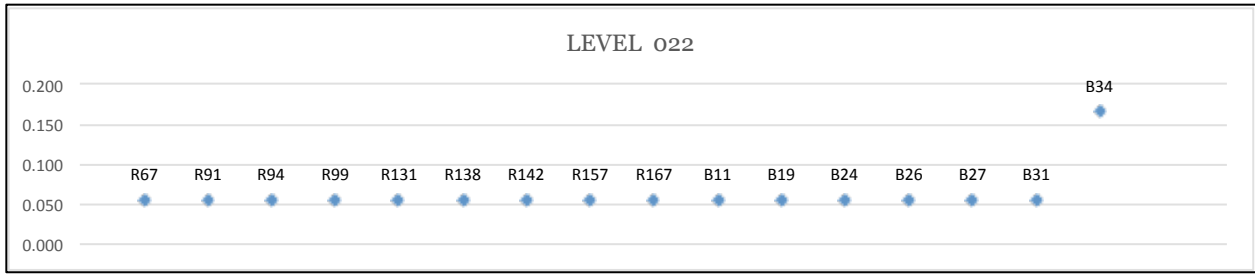

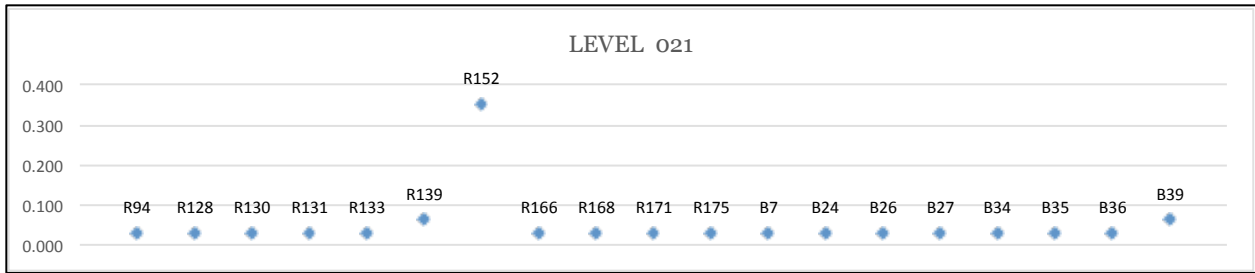

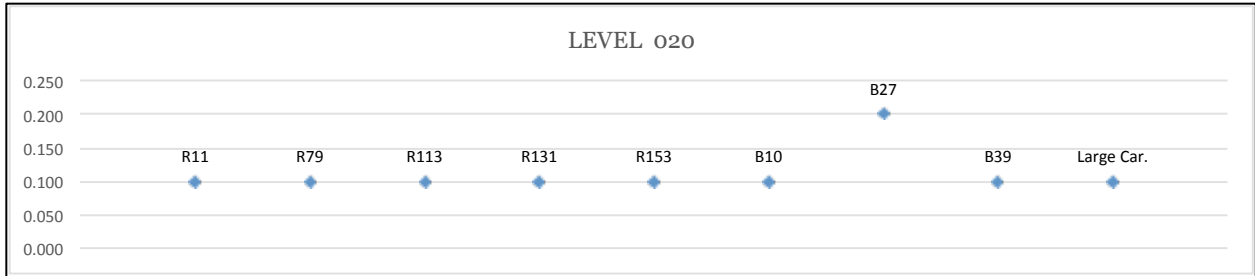

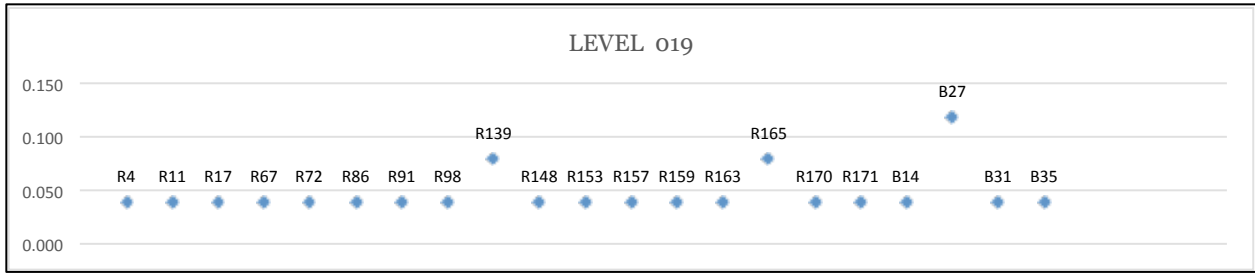

LEVELS BY TYPE

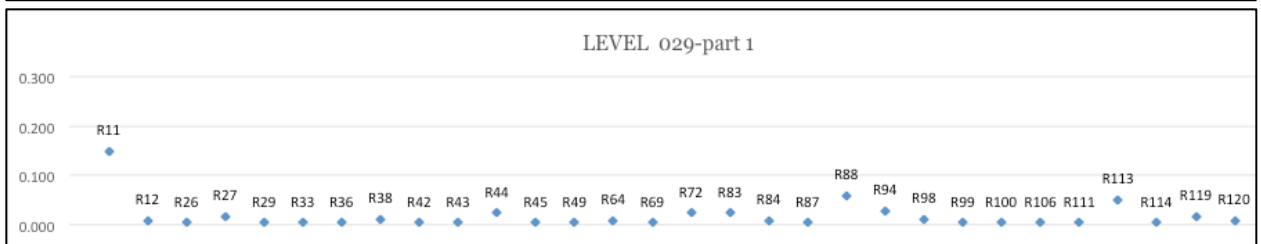

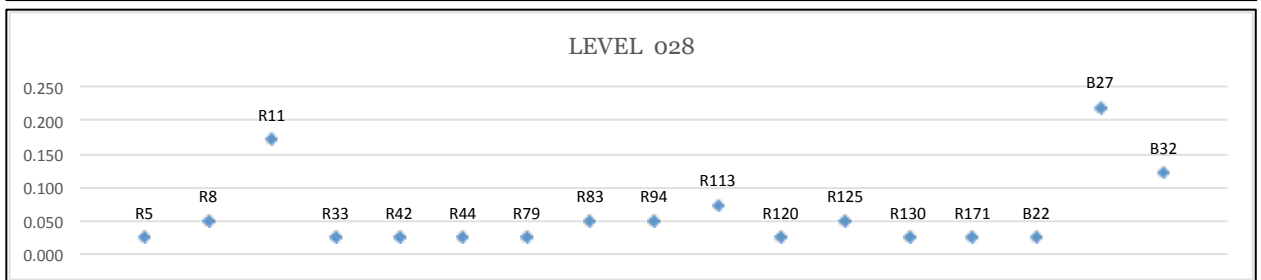

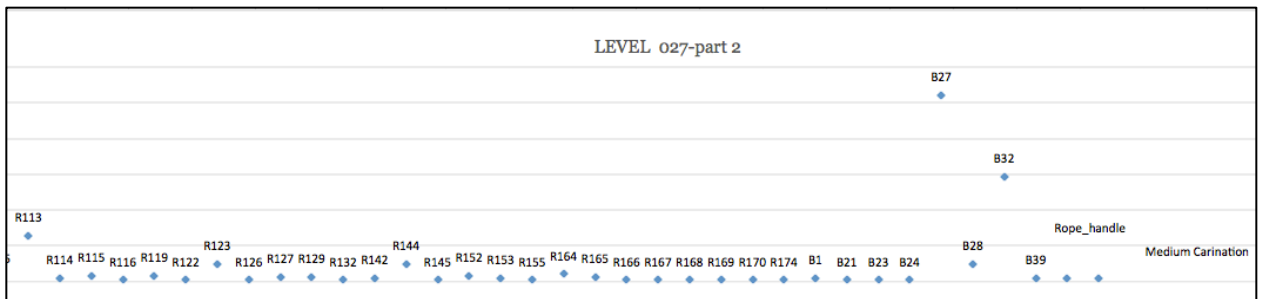

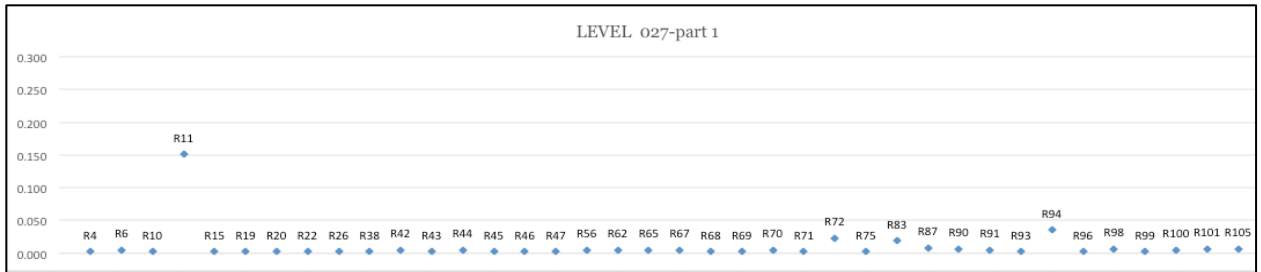

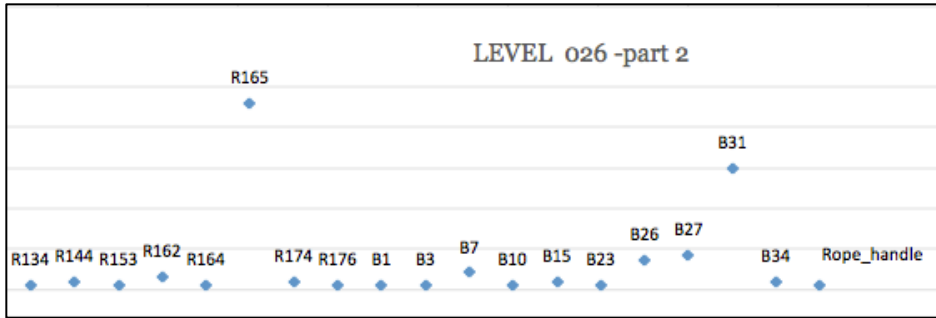

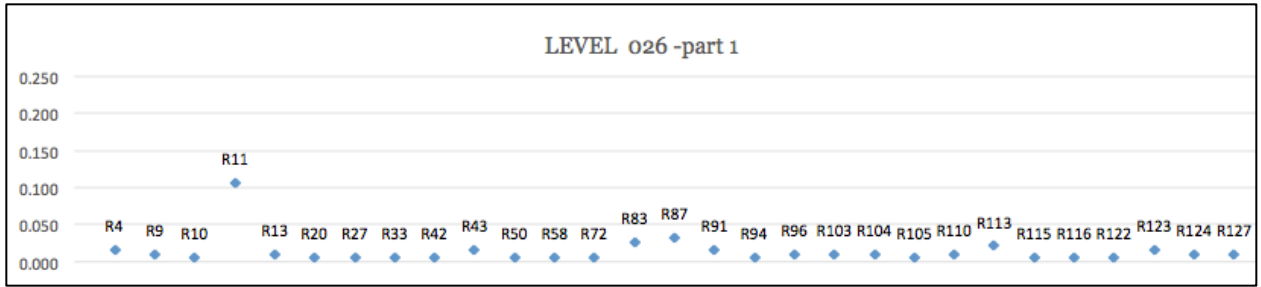

This appendix provides a graph showing the type distribution for each stratigraphic deposit, or level. The level is given in the heading of the graph and each shape type that is present in that level is represented by a dot along the horizontal axis. The vertical axis measures the percentage of the total number of sherds in that level that is represented by each shape type. For purposes of space, upper profile types are called “R” and lower profile types are called “B.”

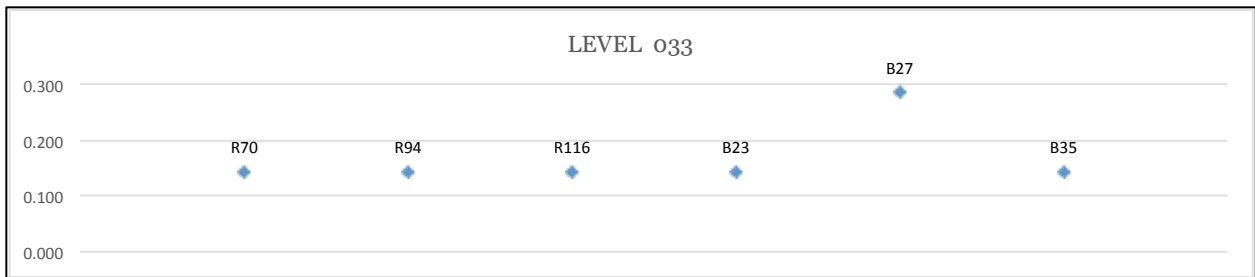

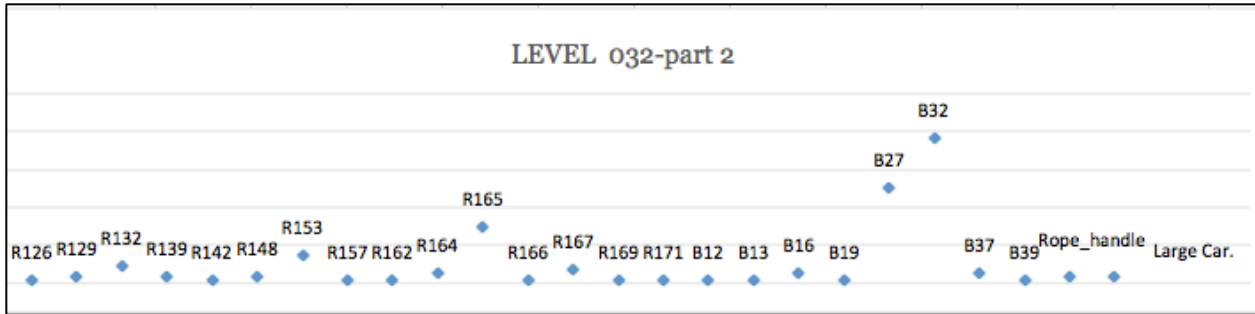

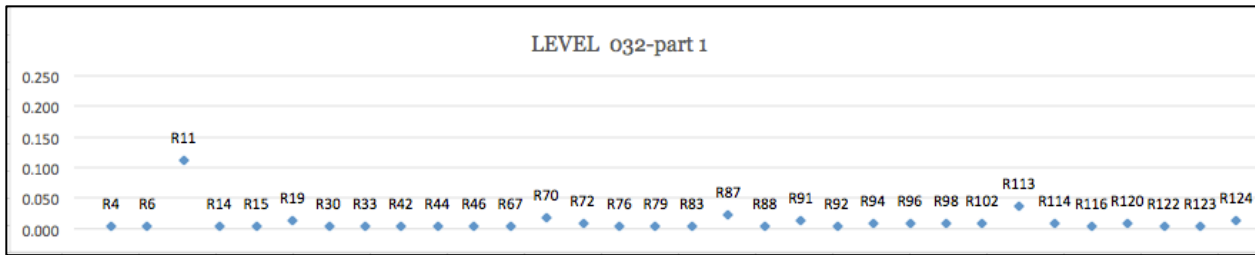

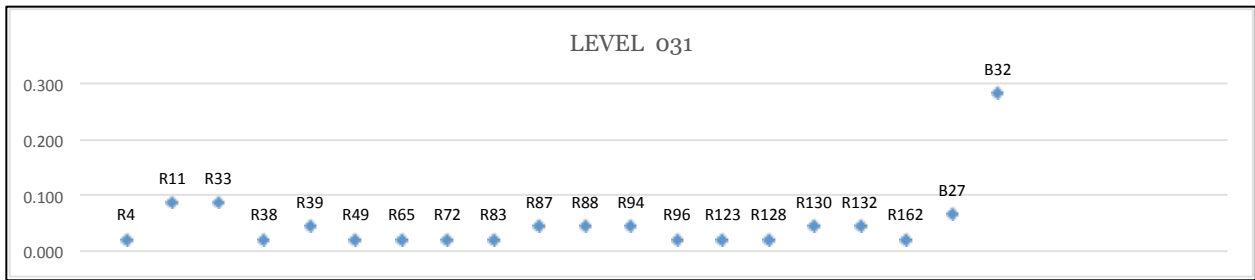

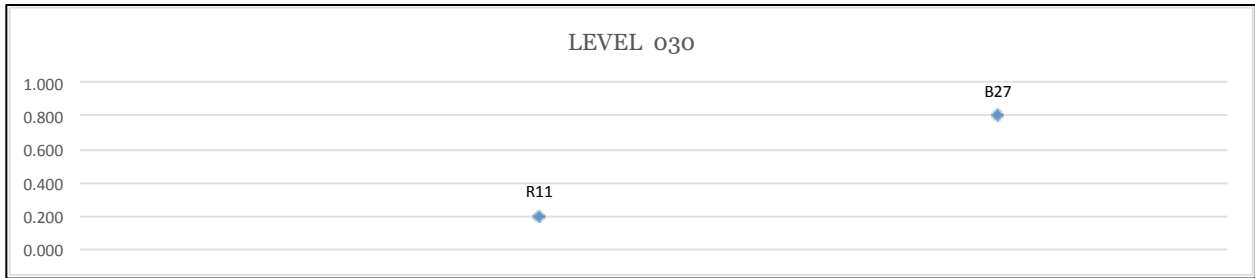

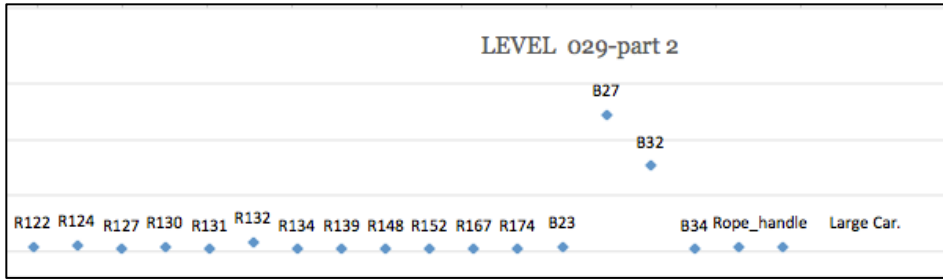

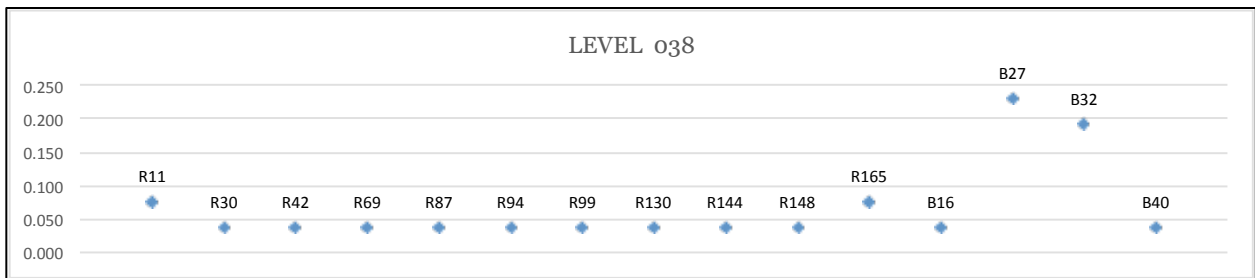

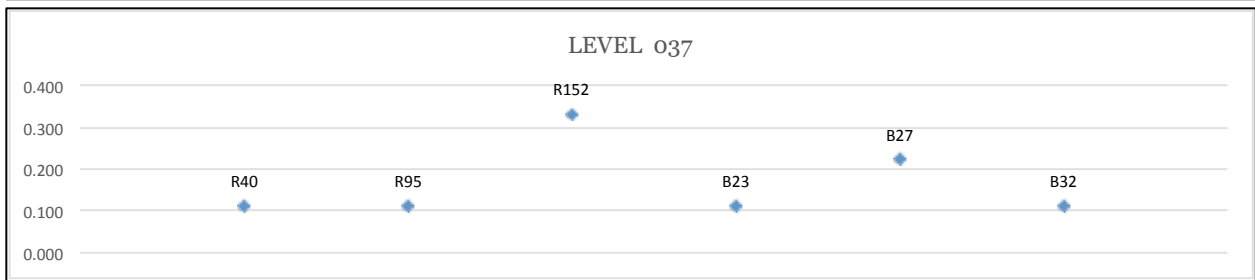

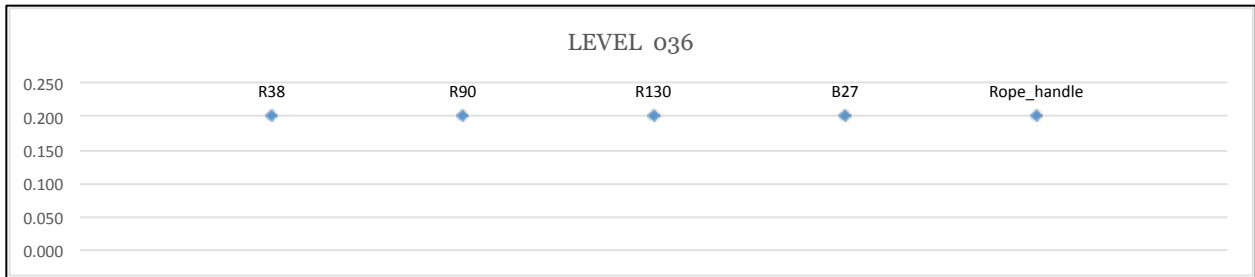

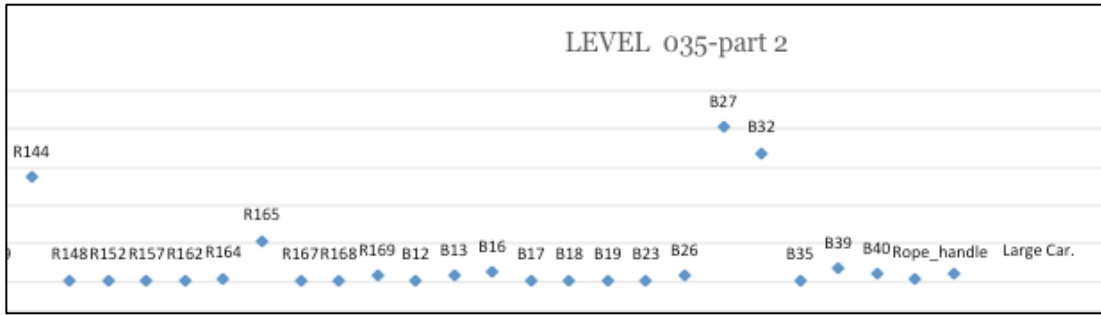

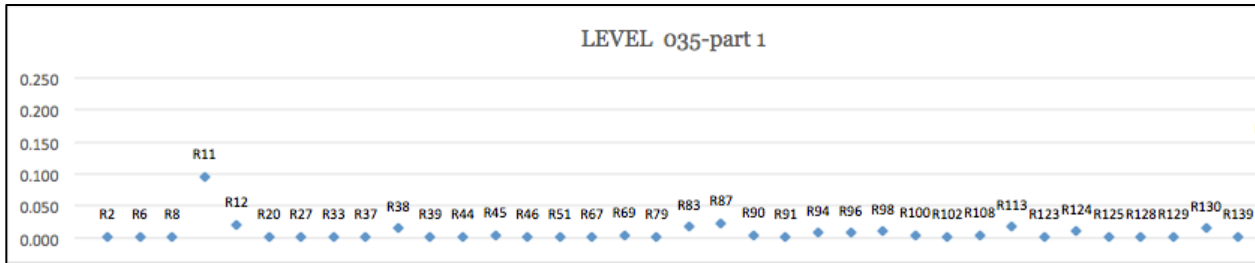

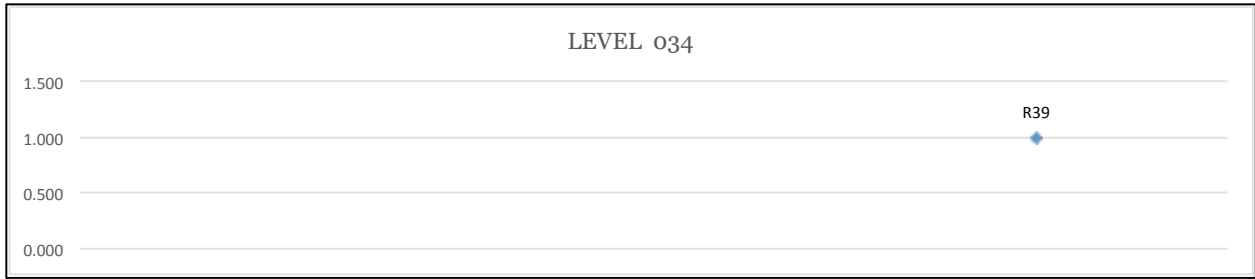

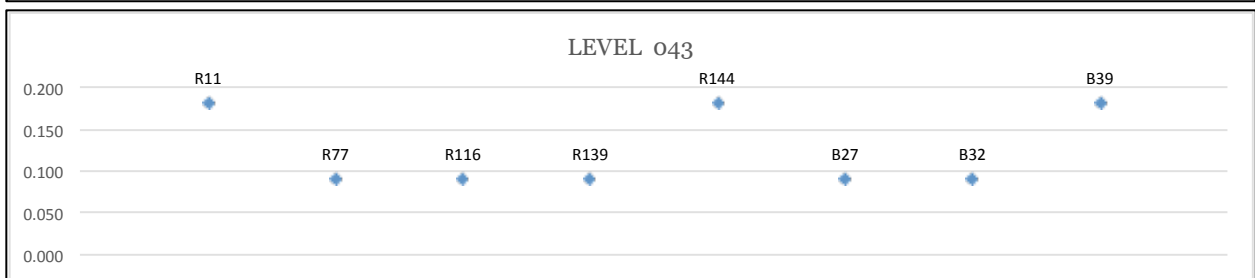

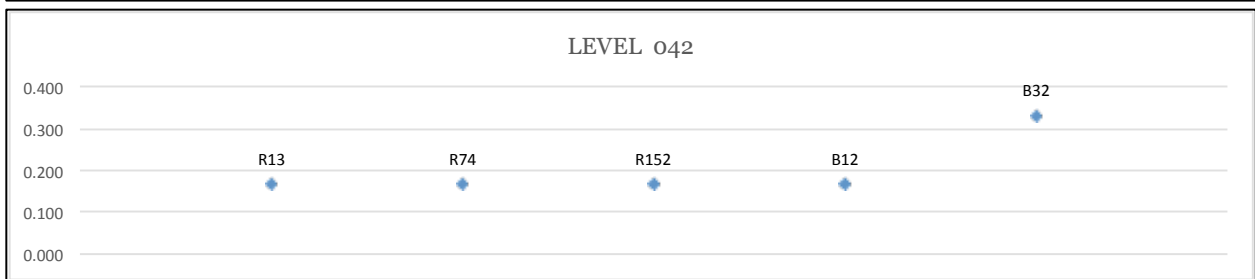

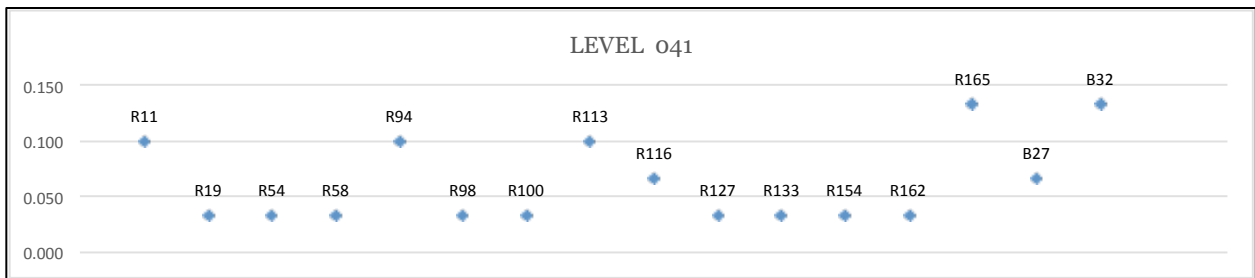

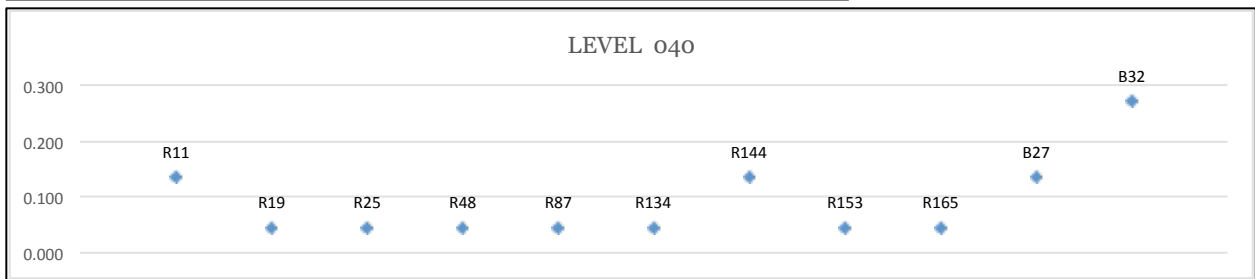

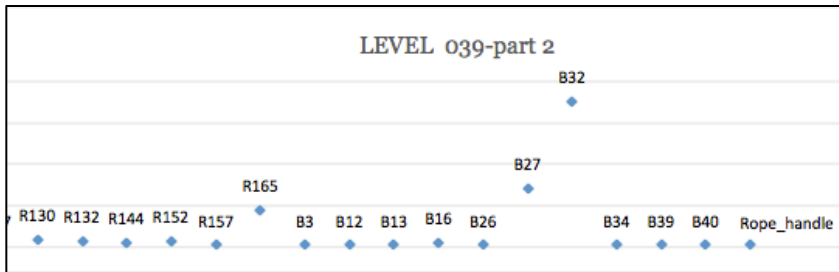

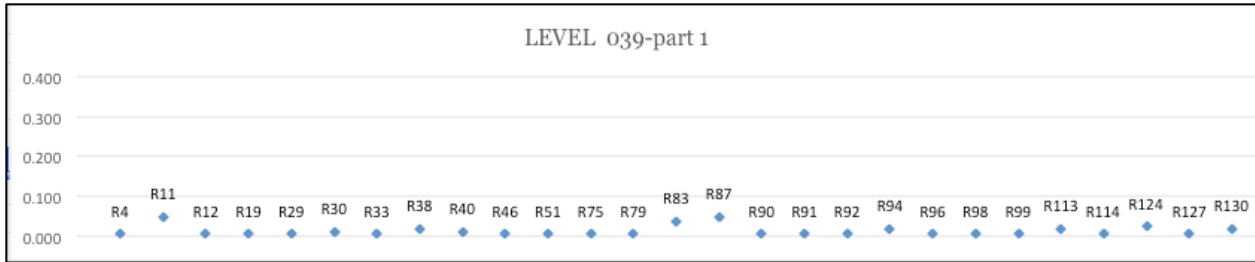

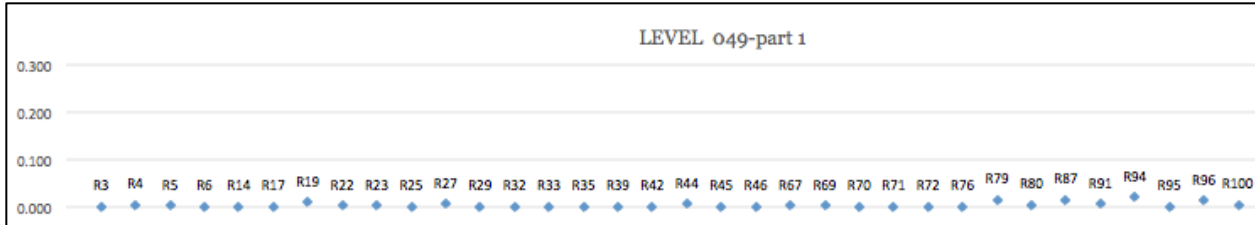

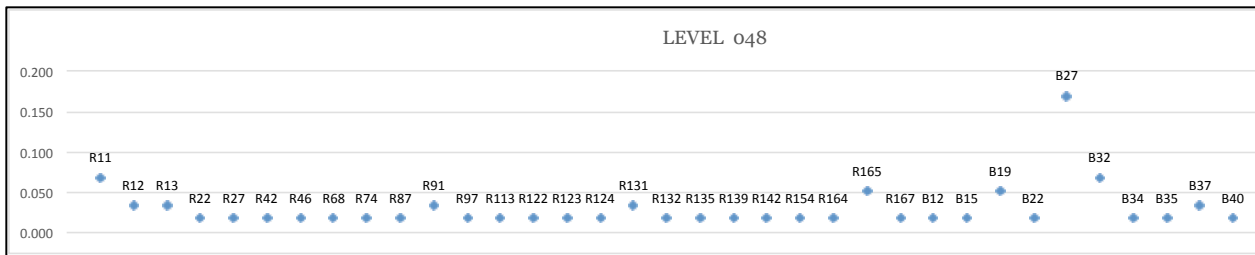

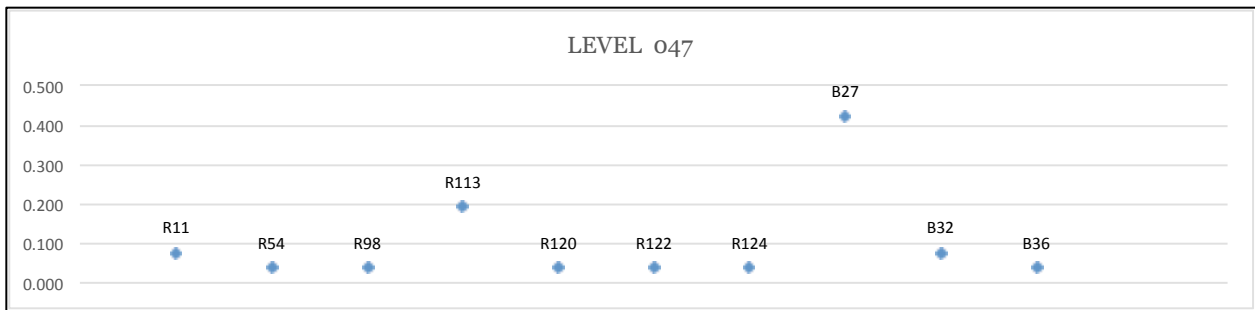

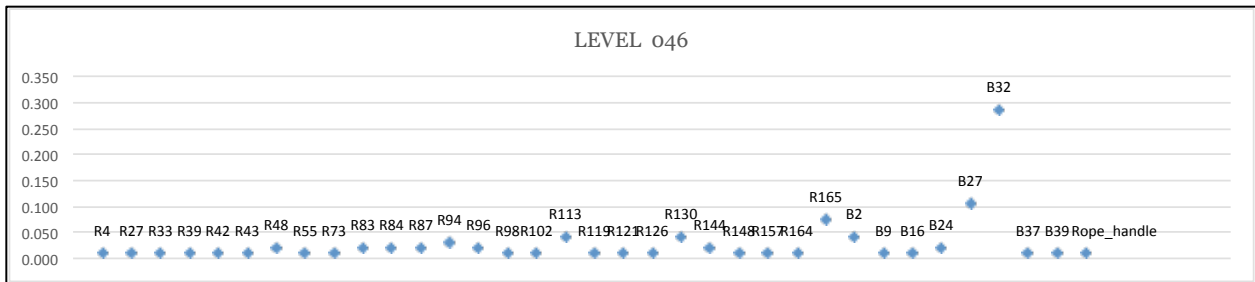

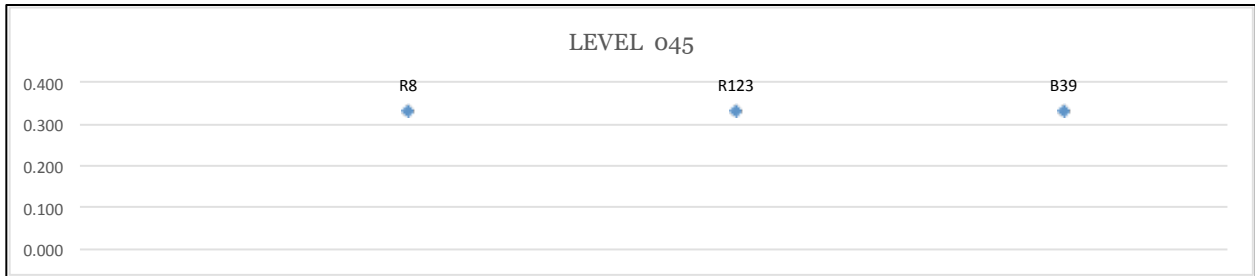

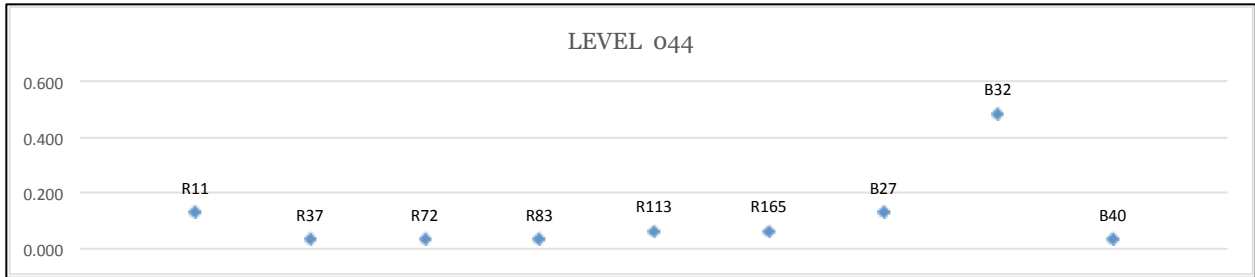

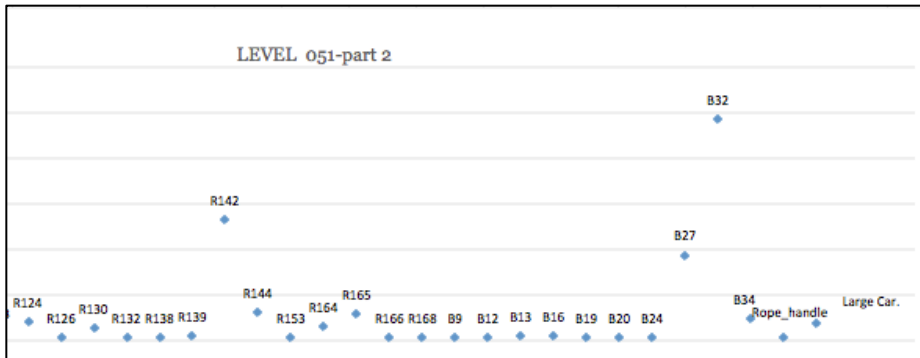

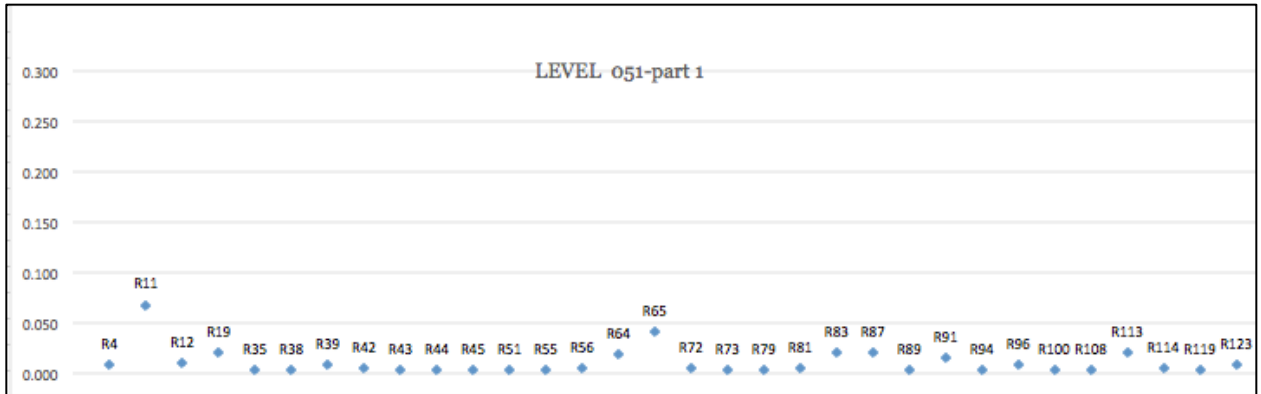

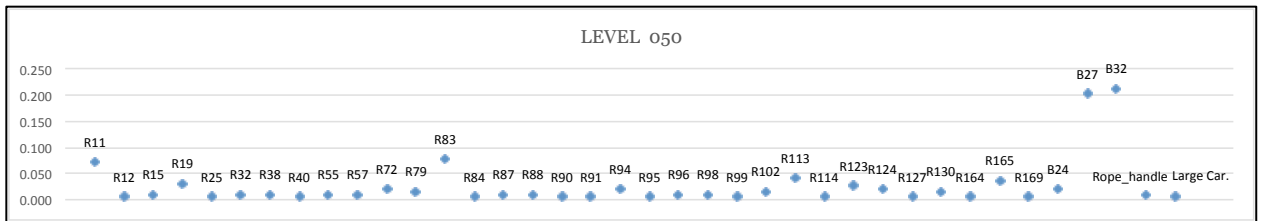

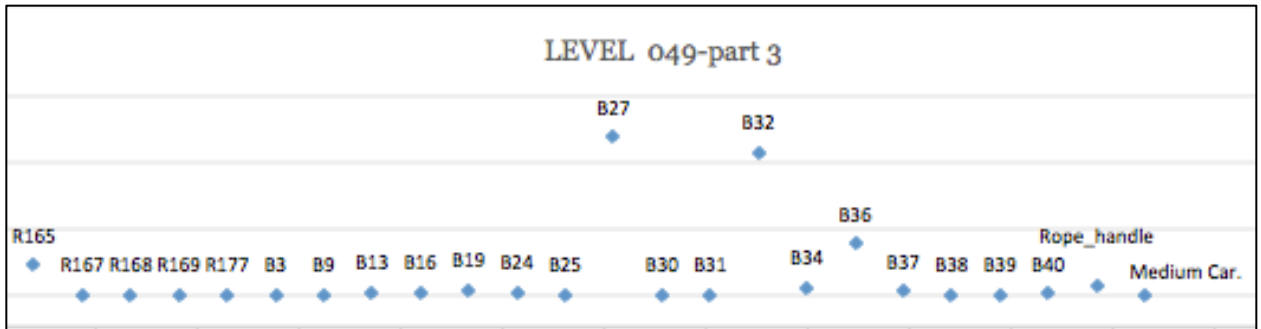

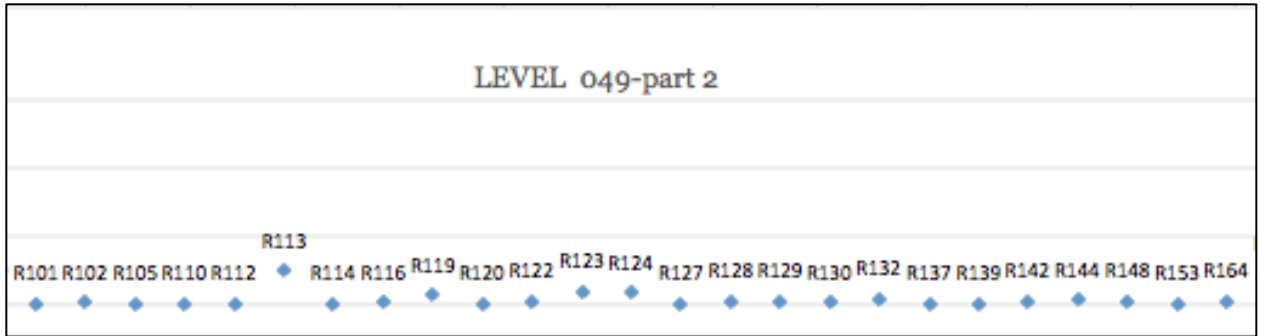

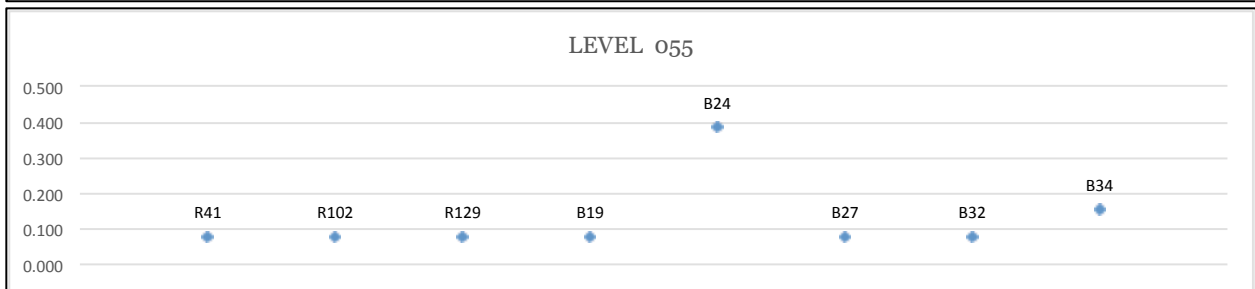

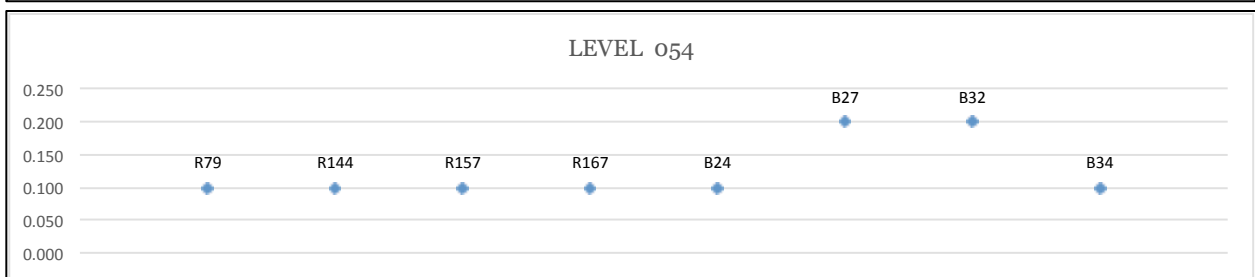

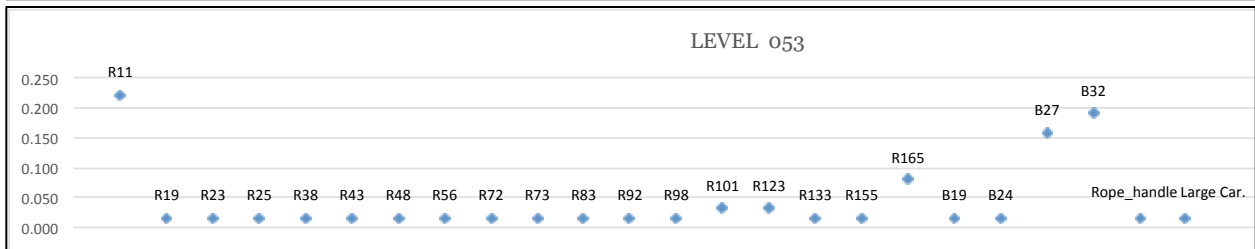

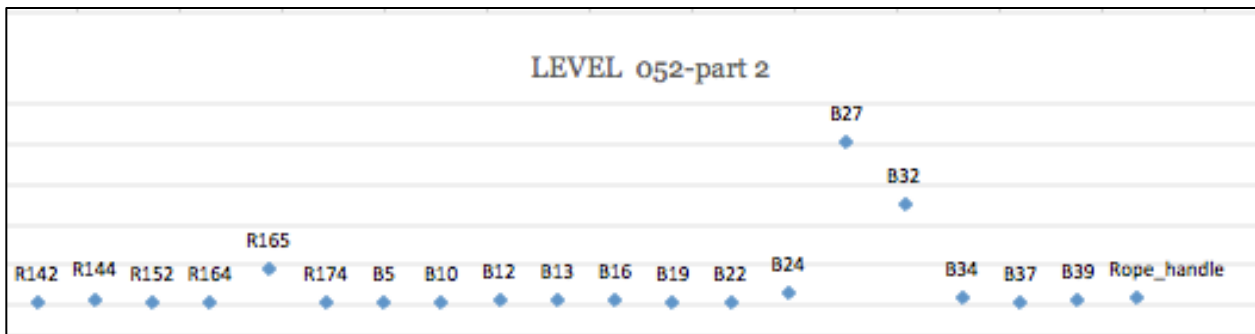

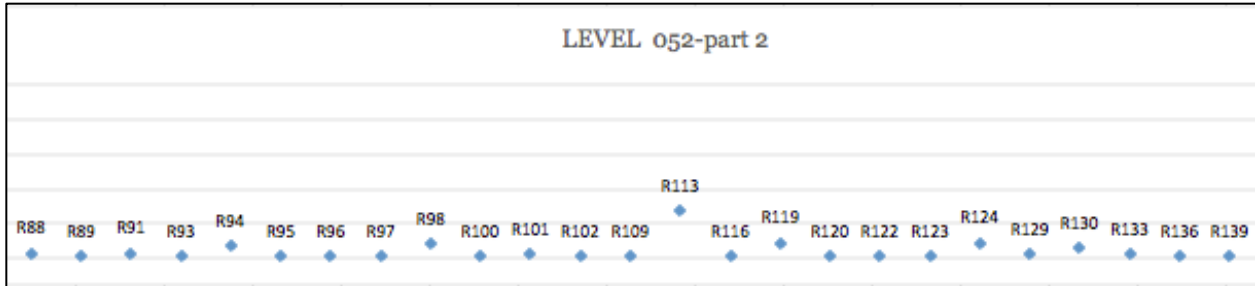

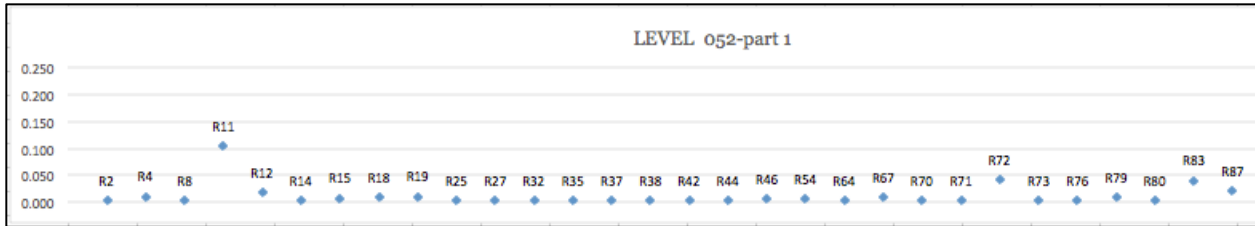

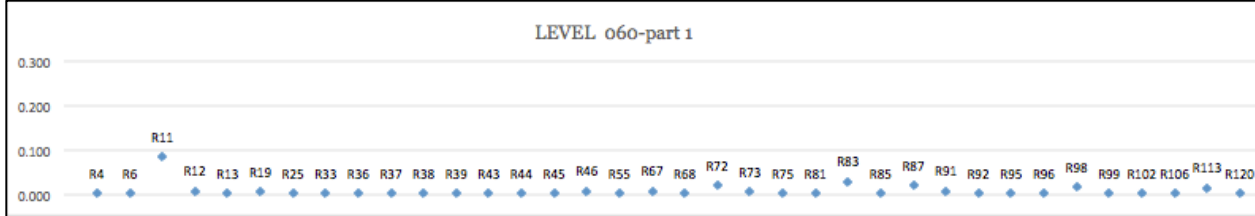

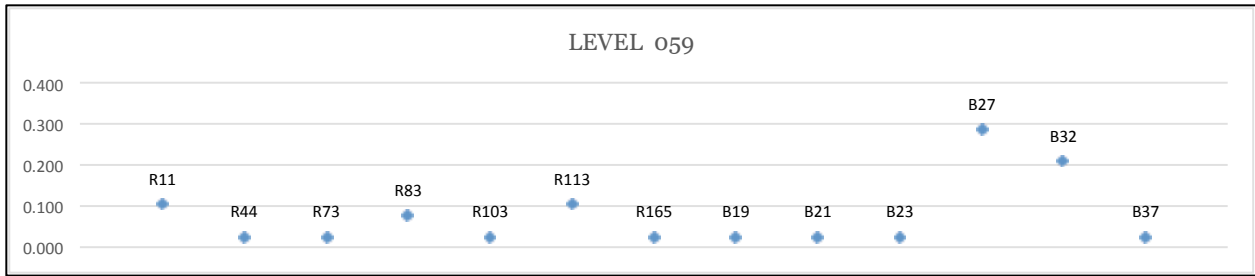

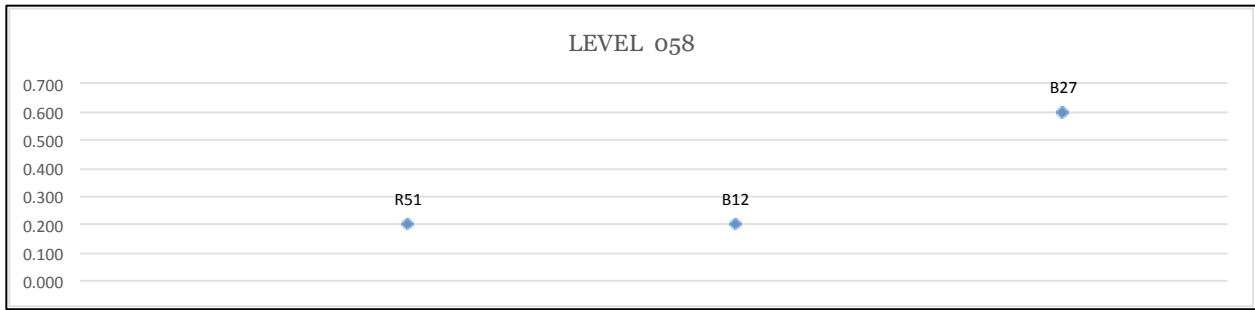

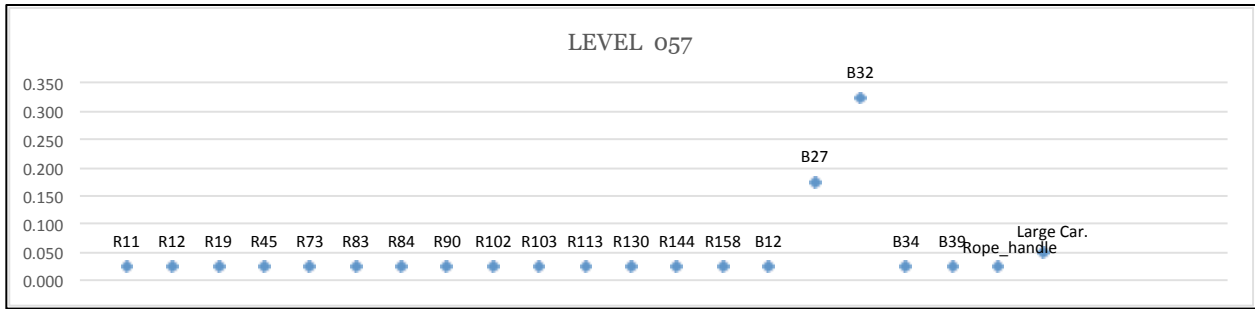

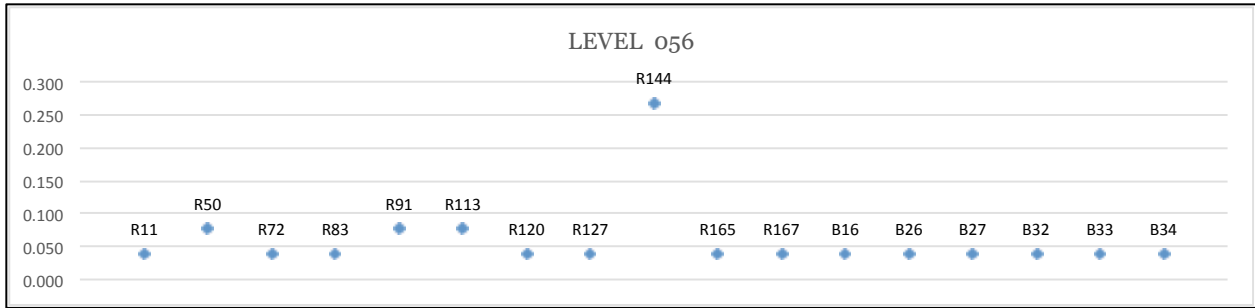

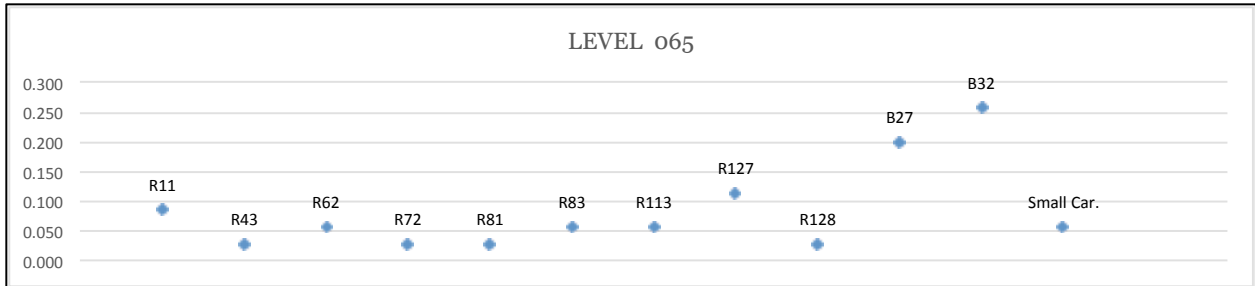

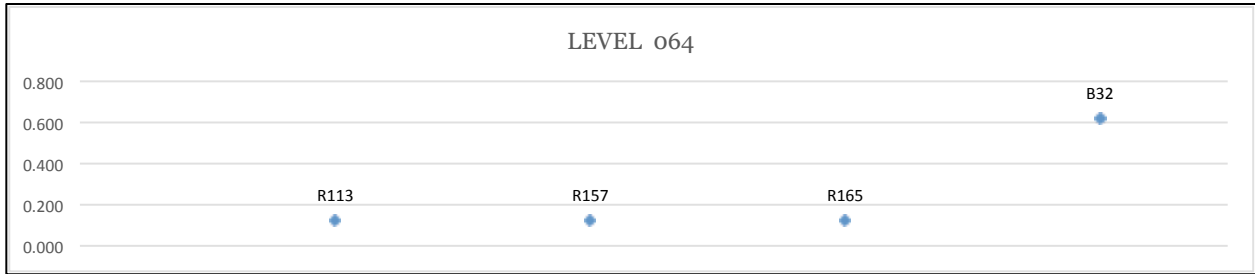

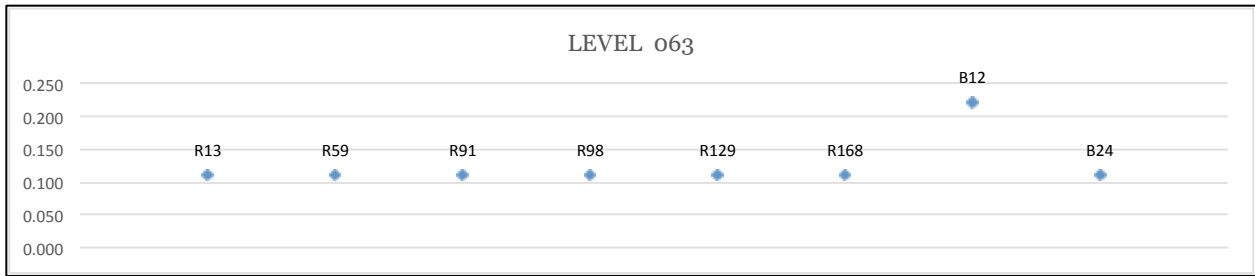

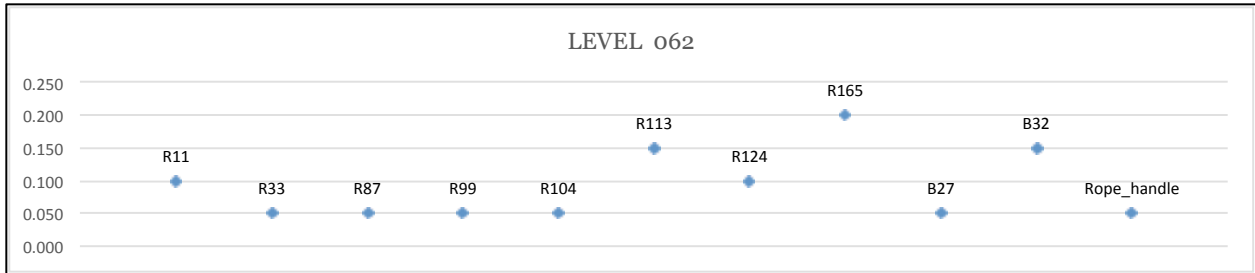

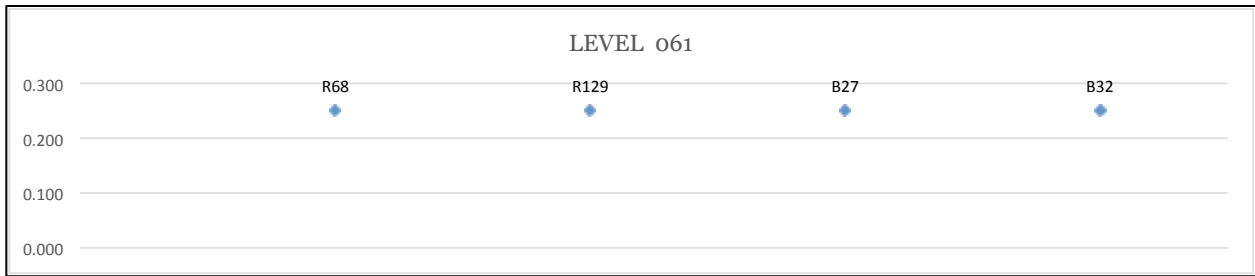

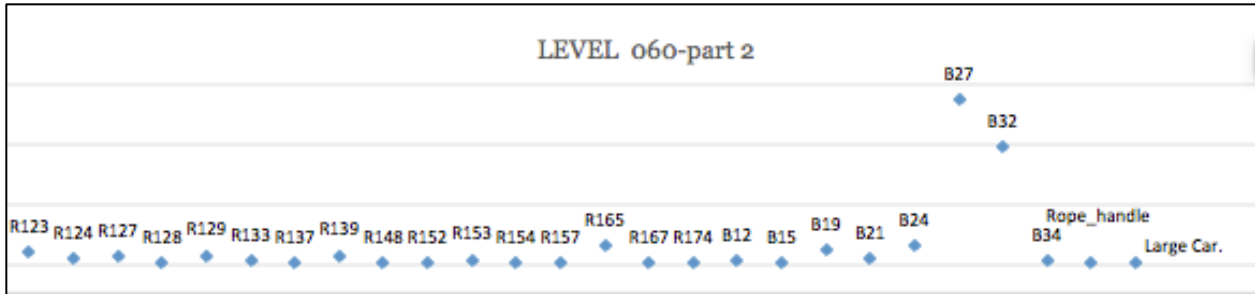

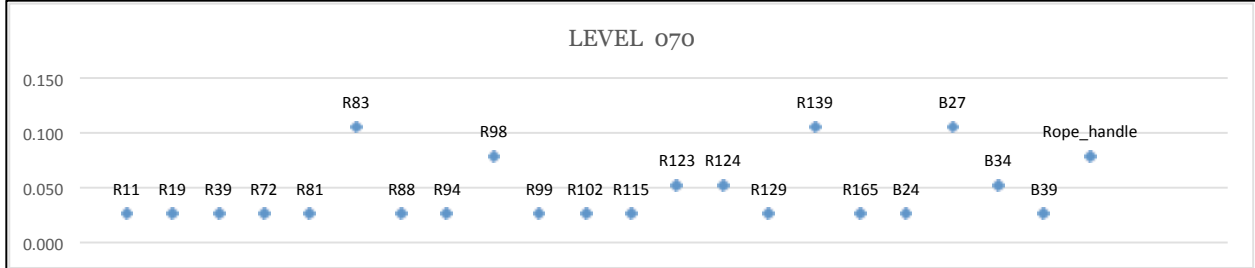

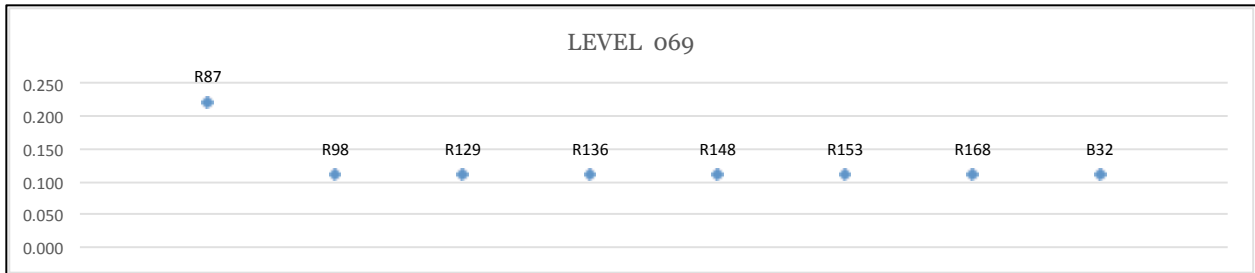

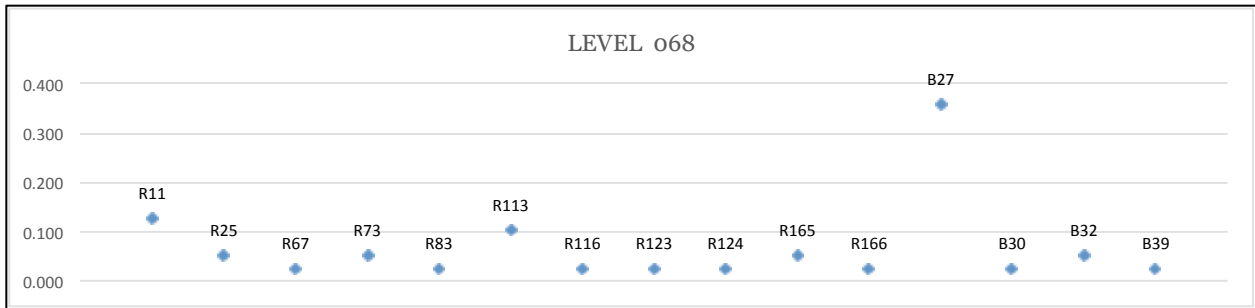

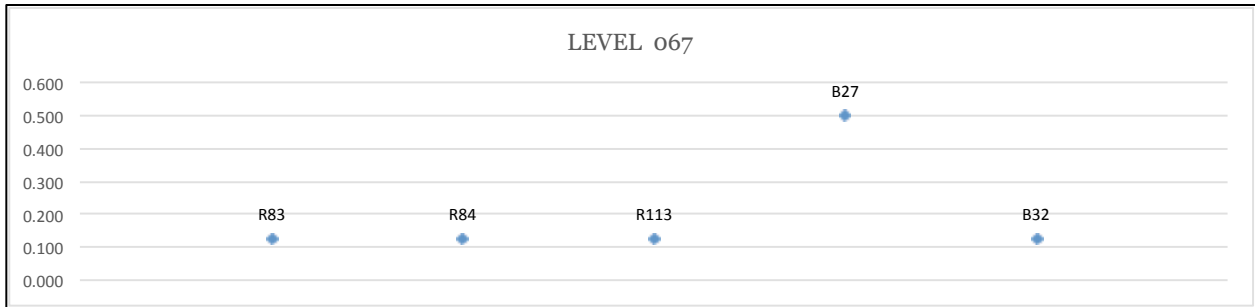

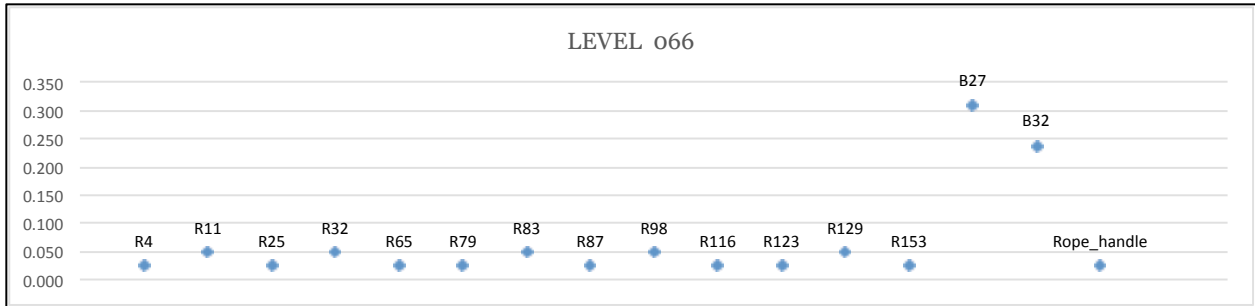

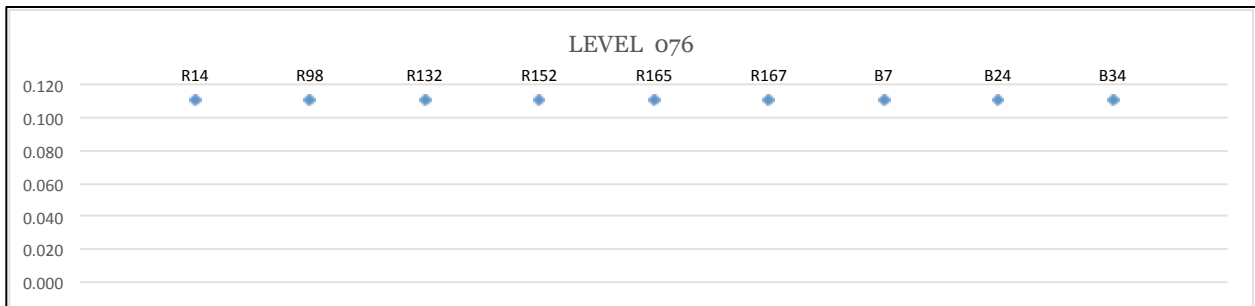

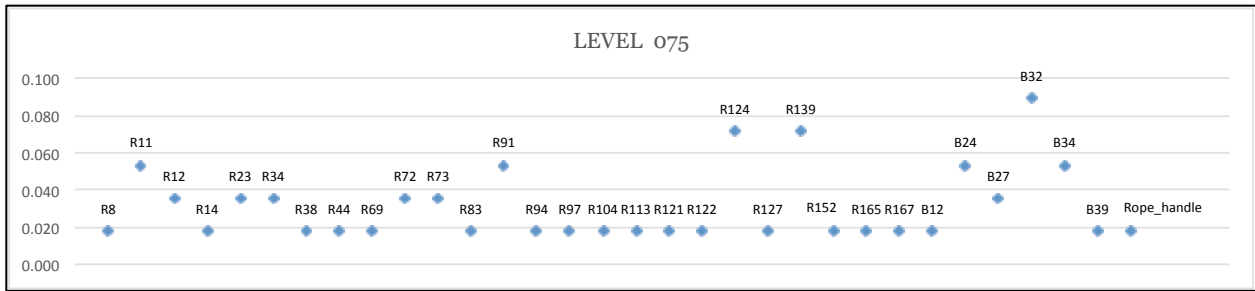

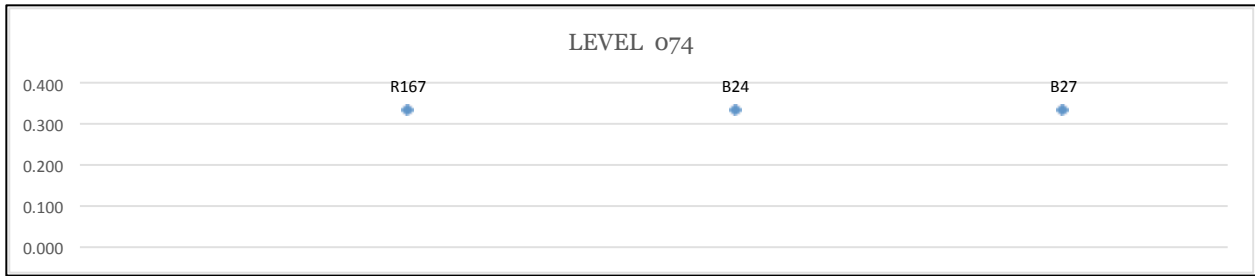

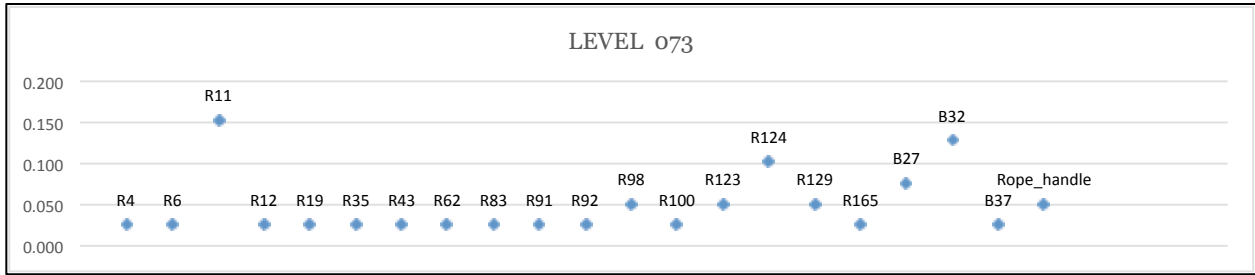

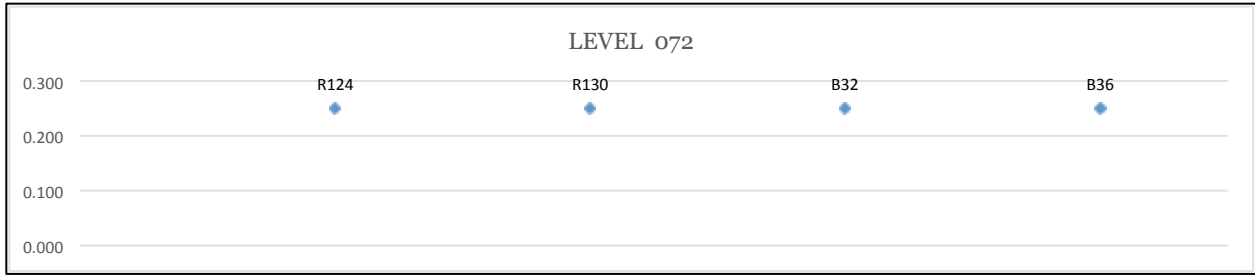

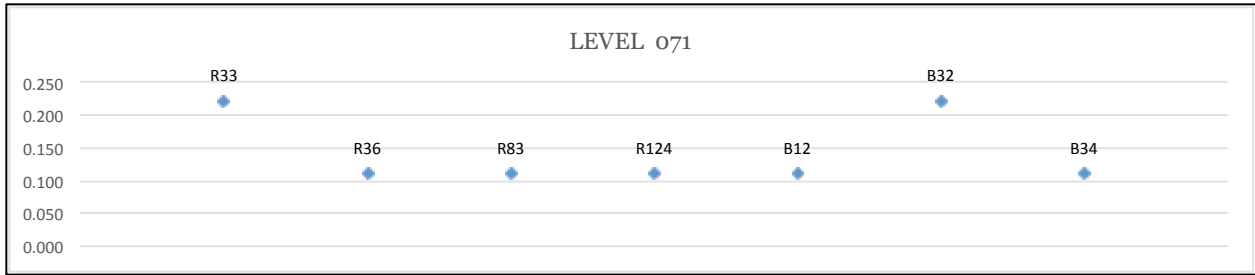

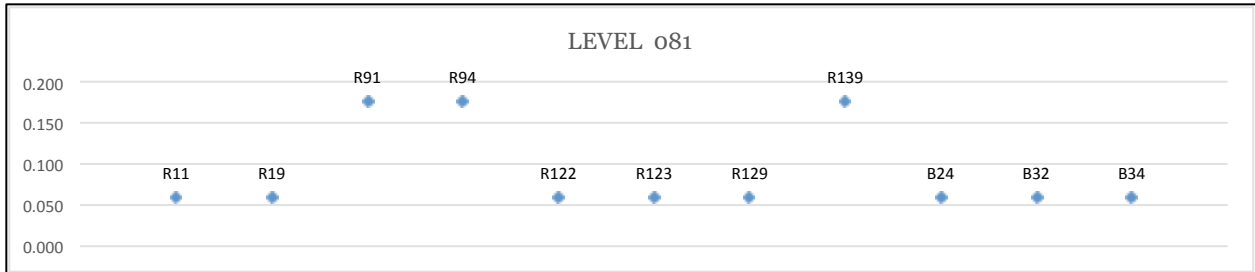

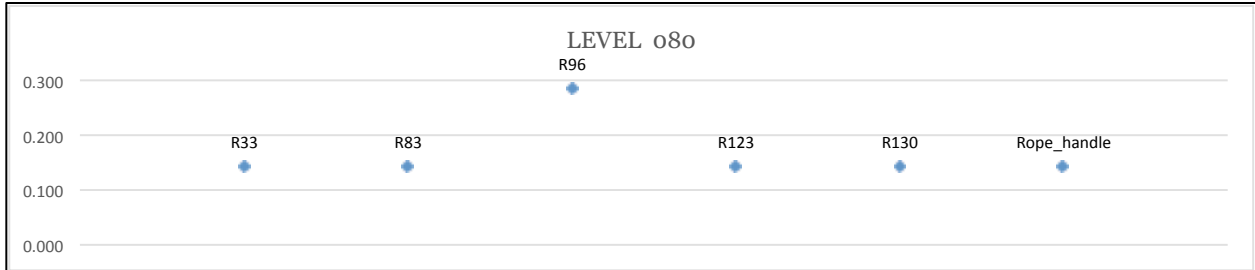

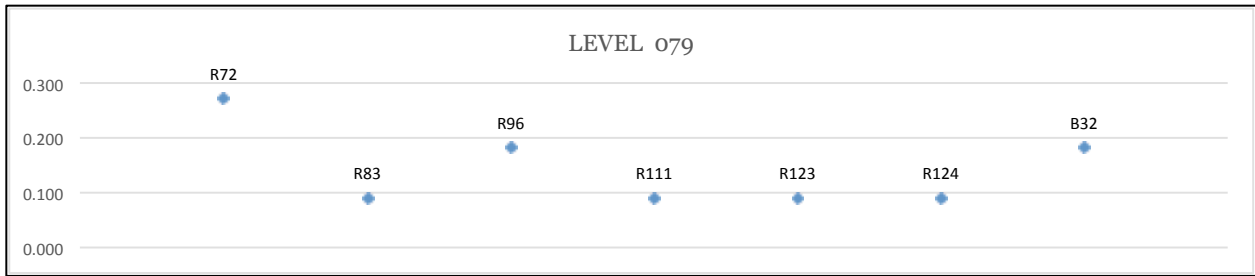

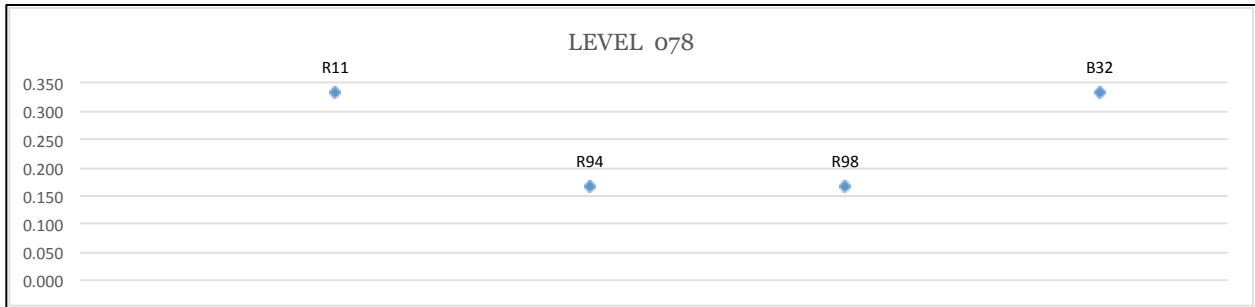

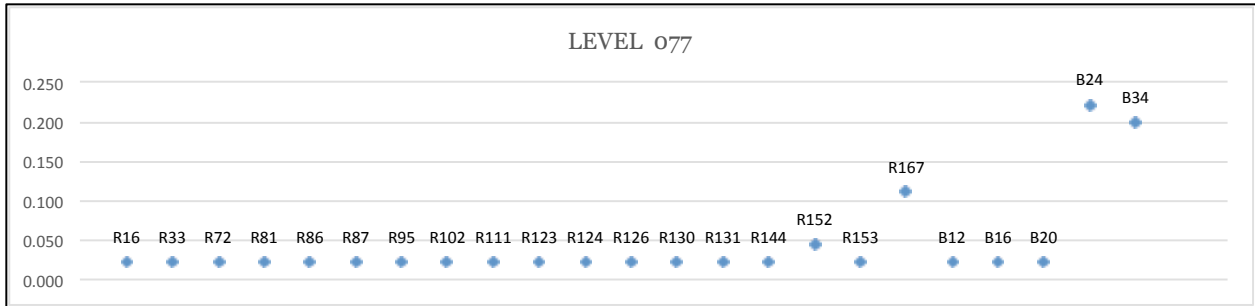

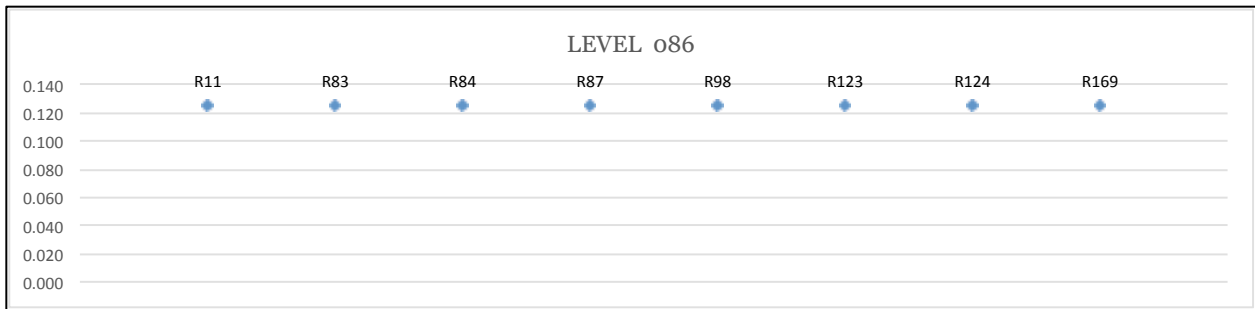

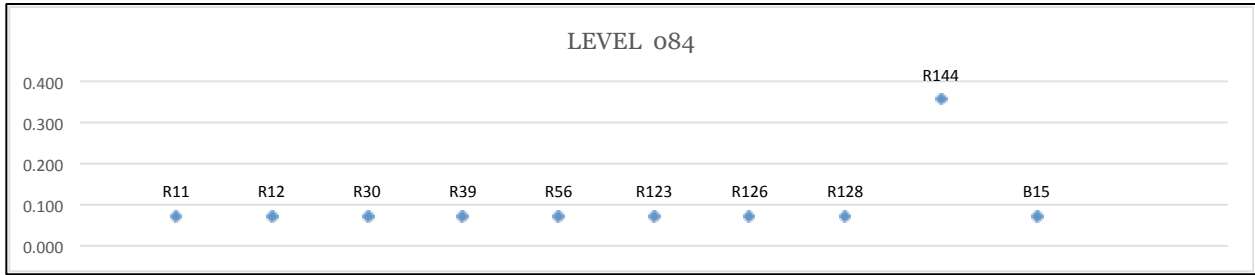

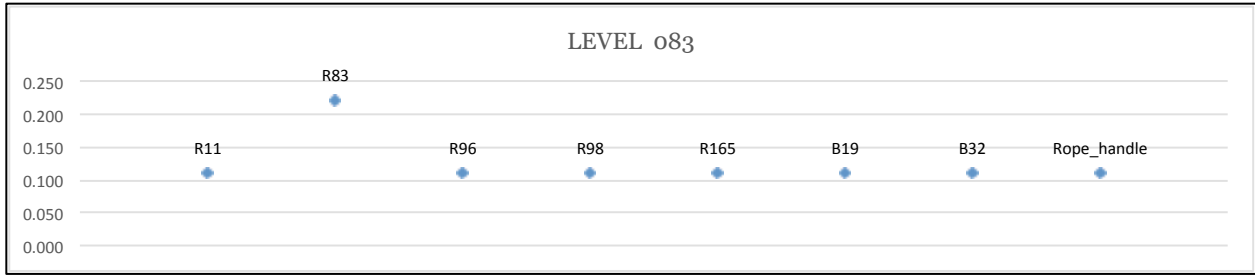

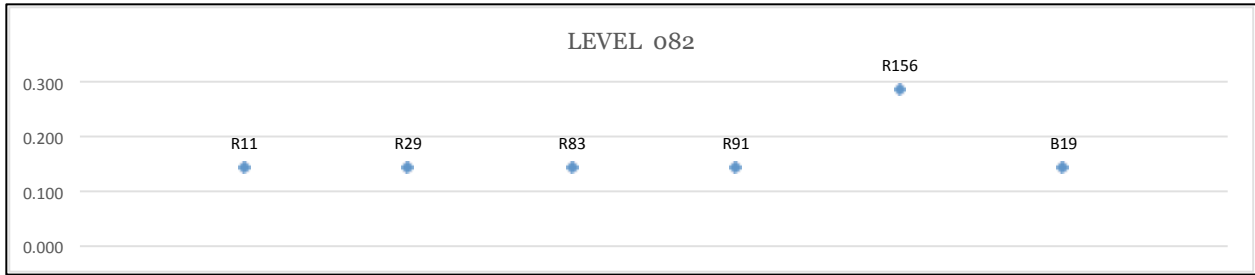

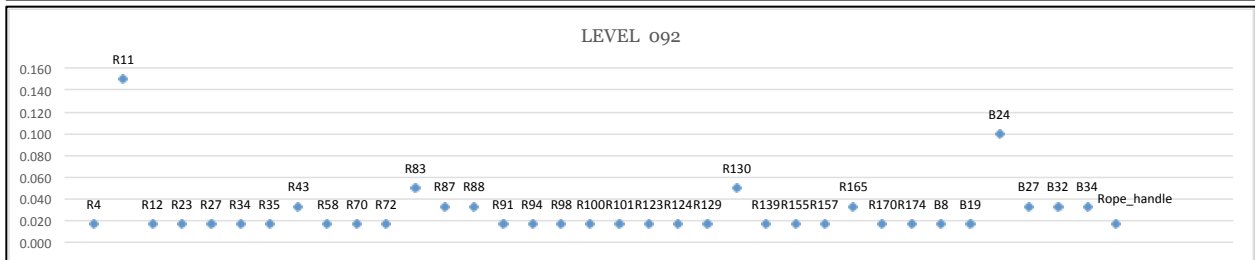

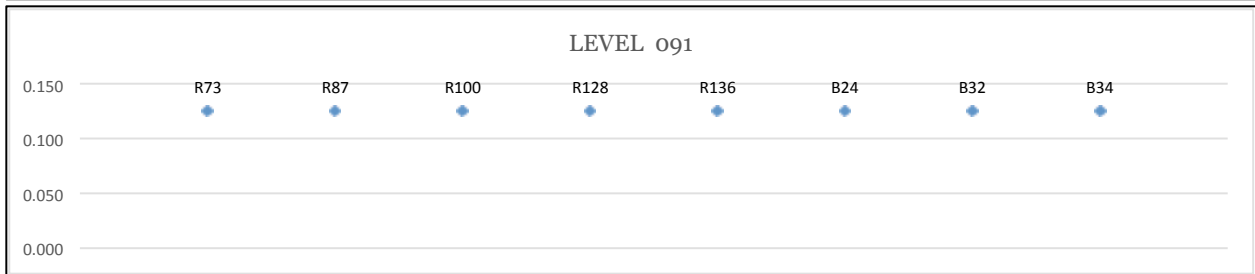

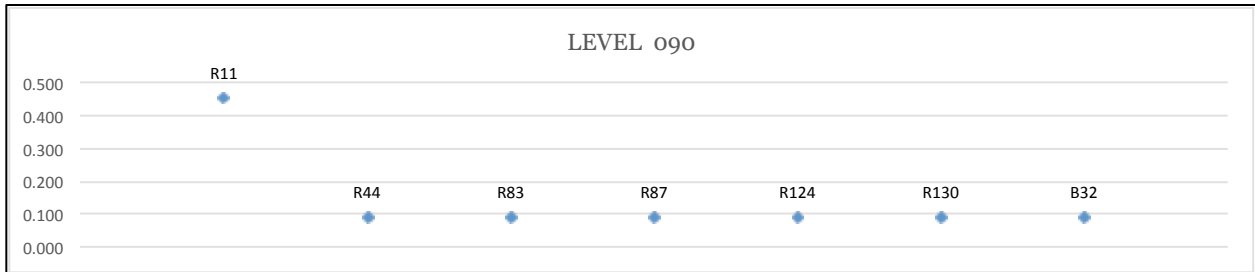

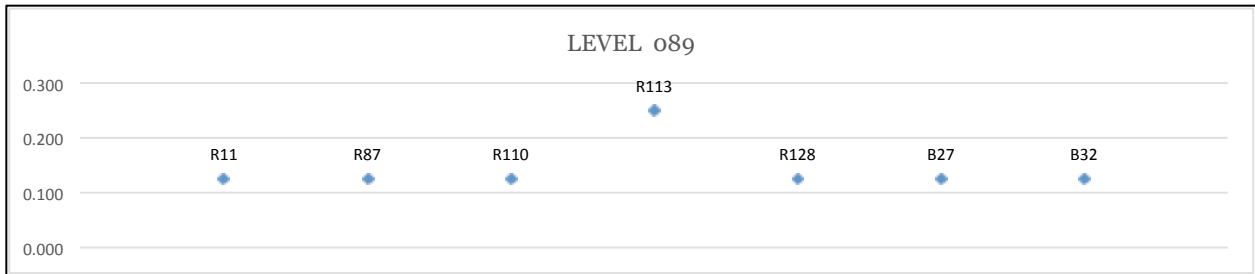

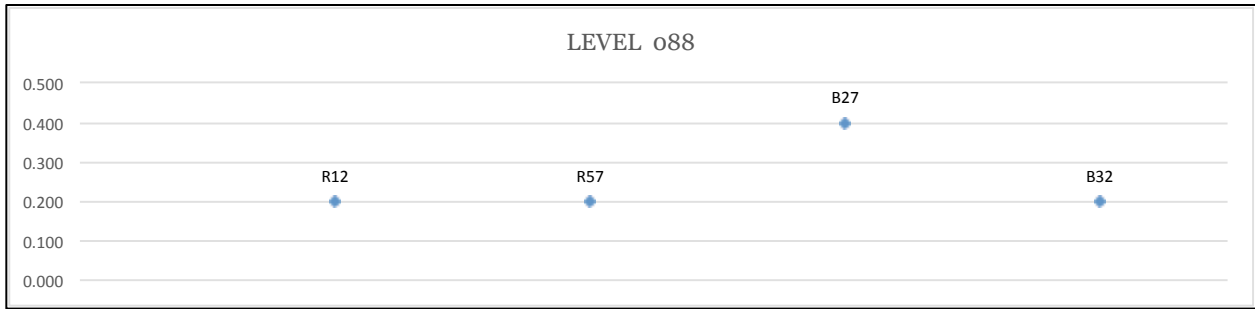

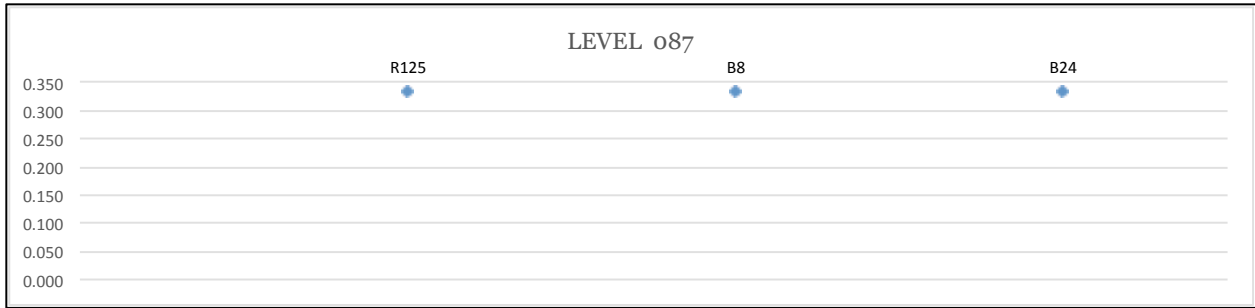

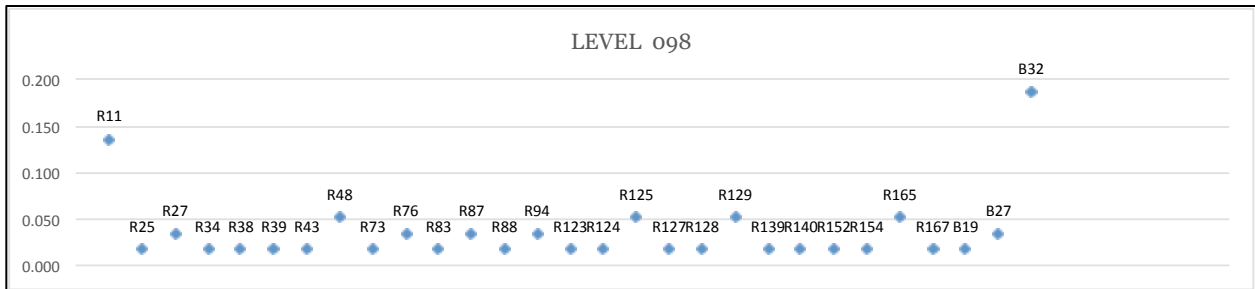

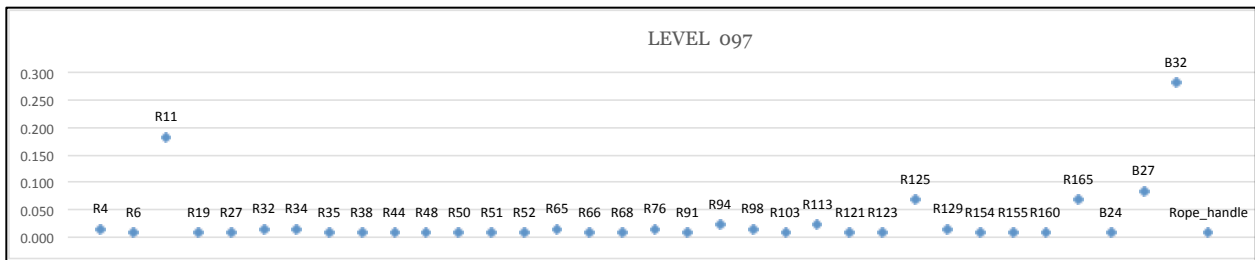

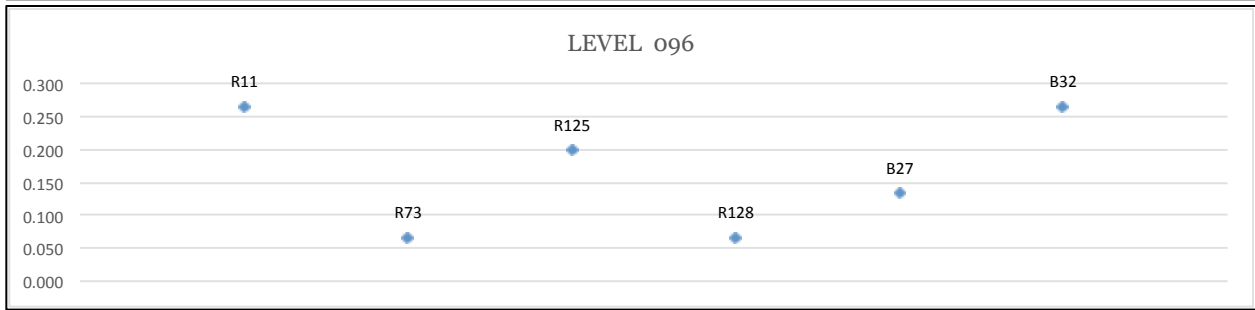

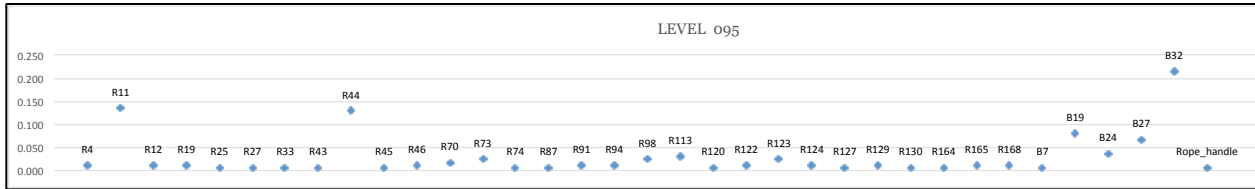

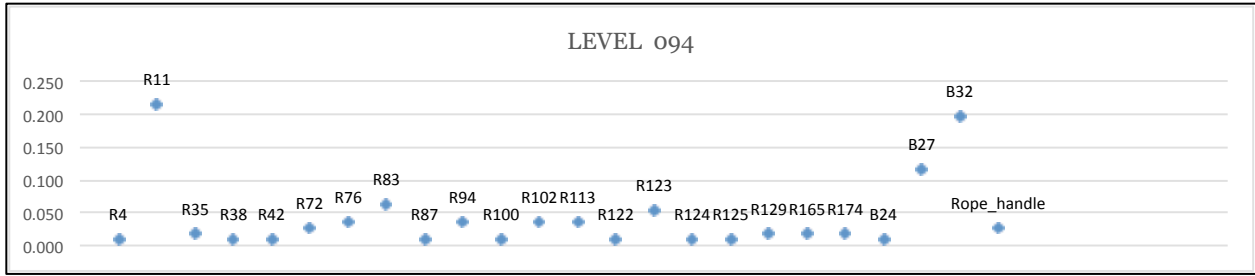

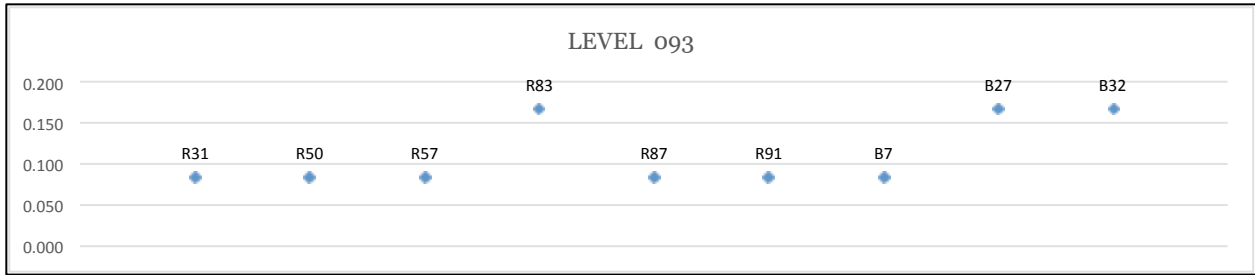

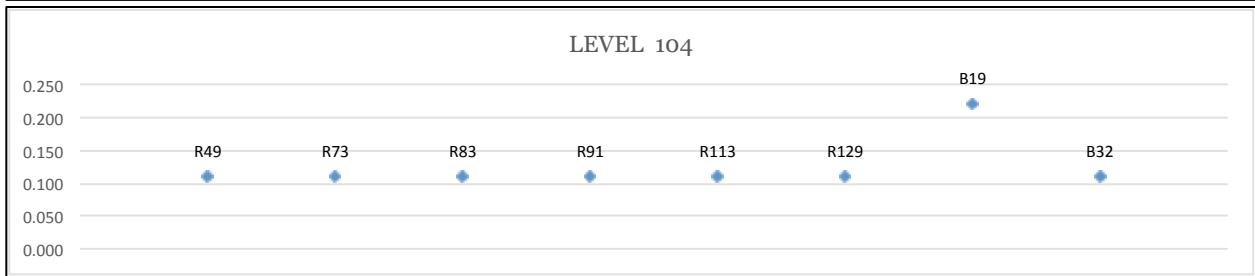

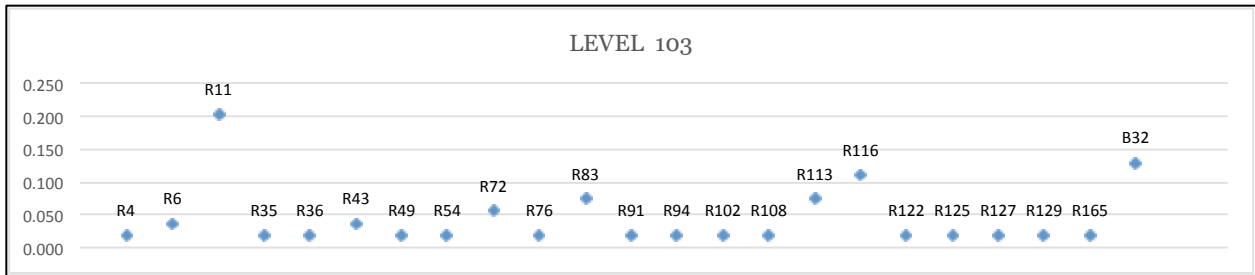

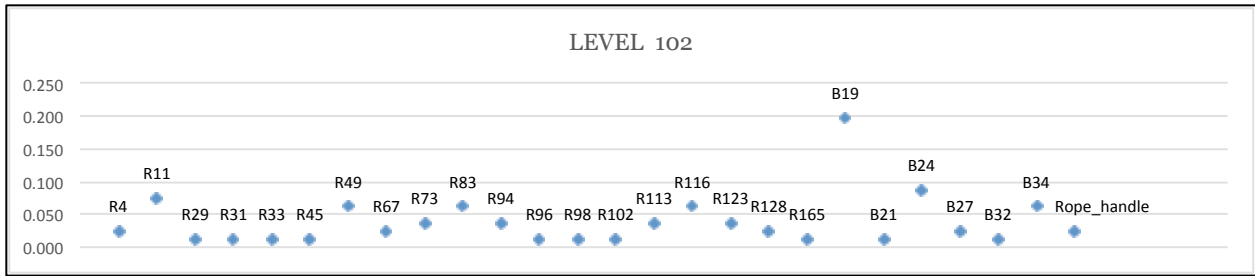

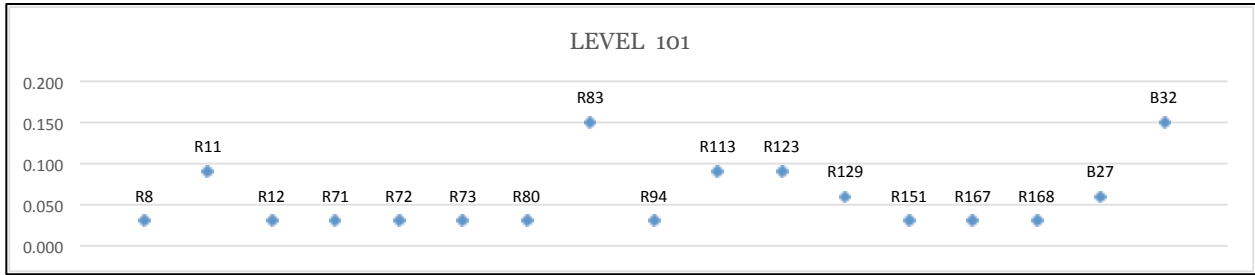

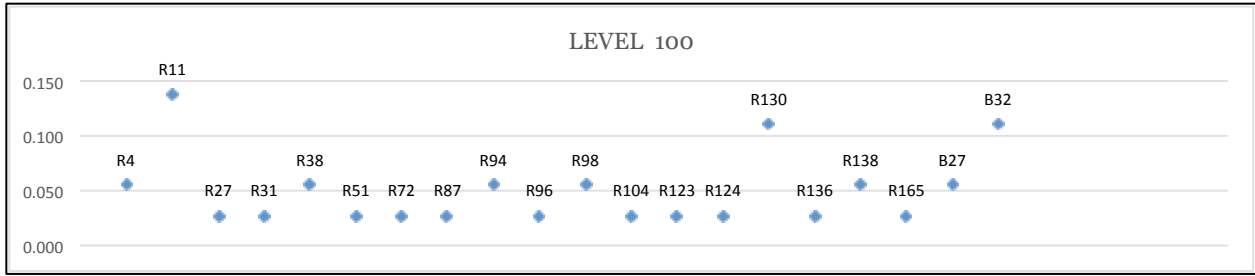

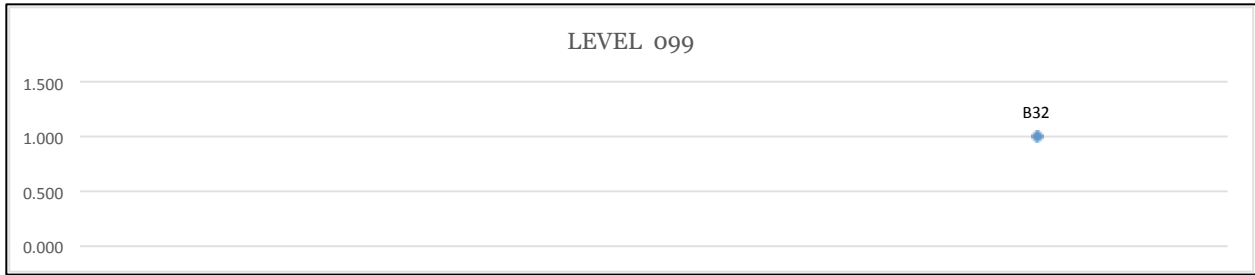

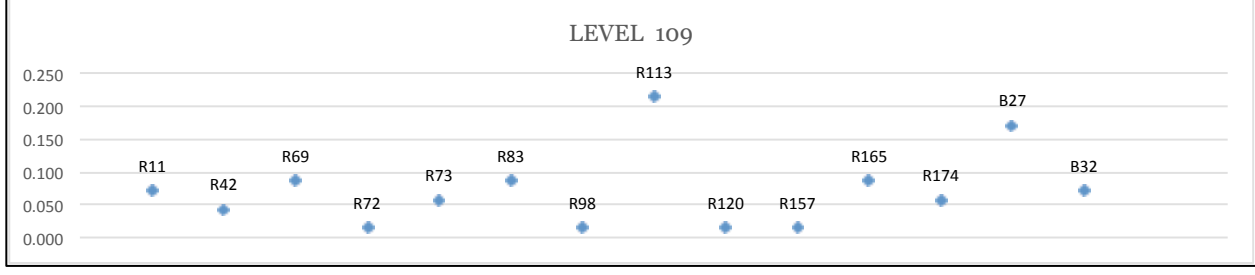

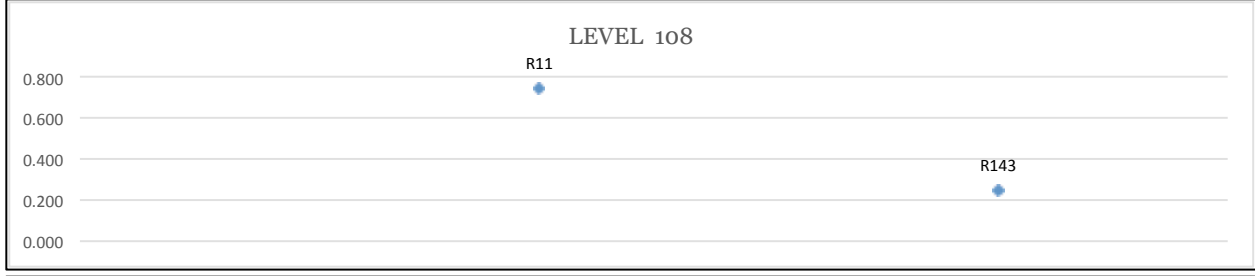

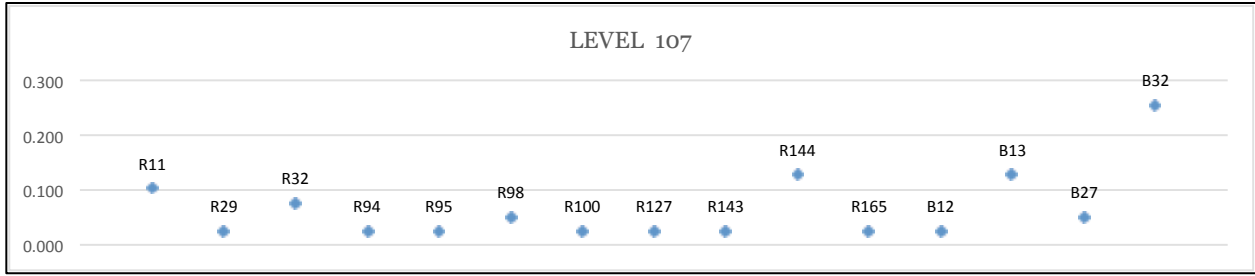

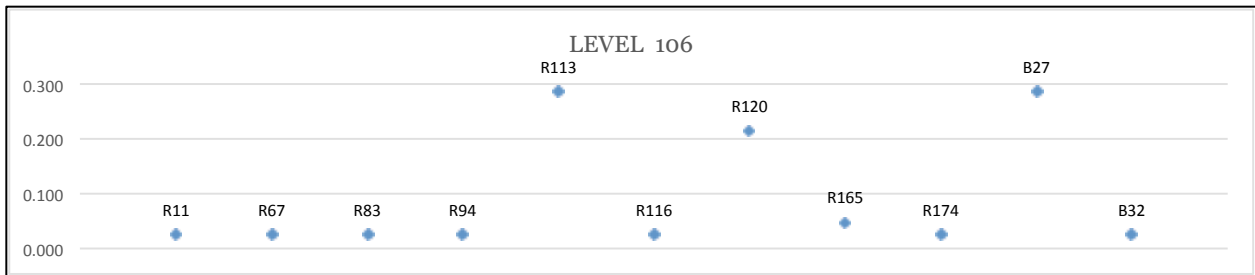

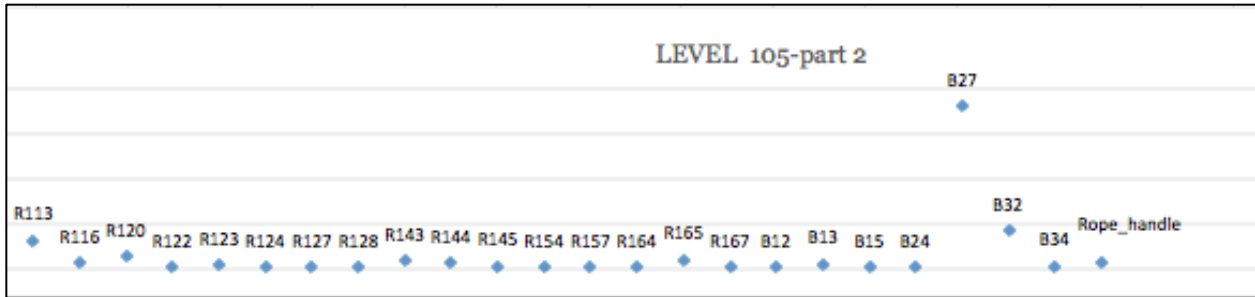

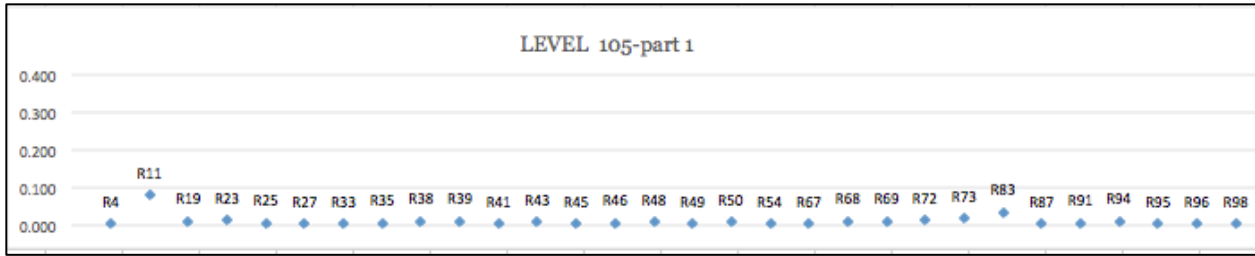

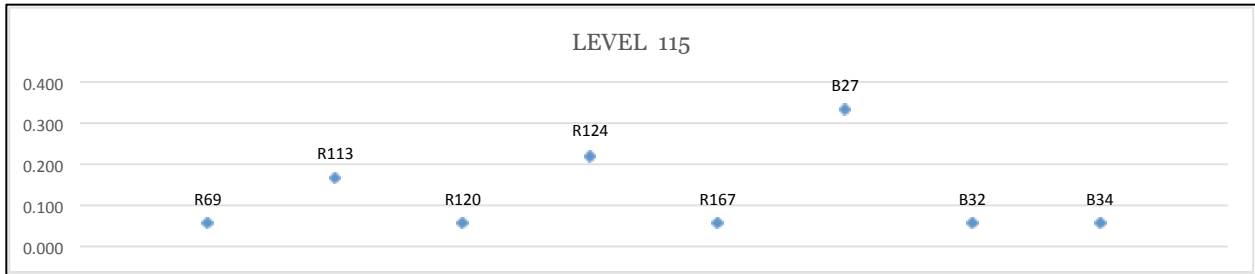

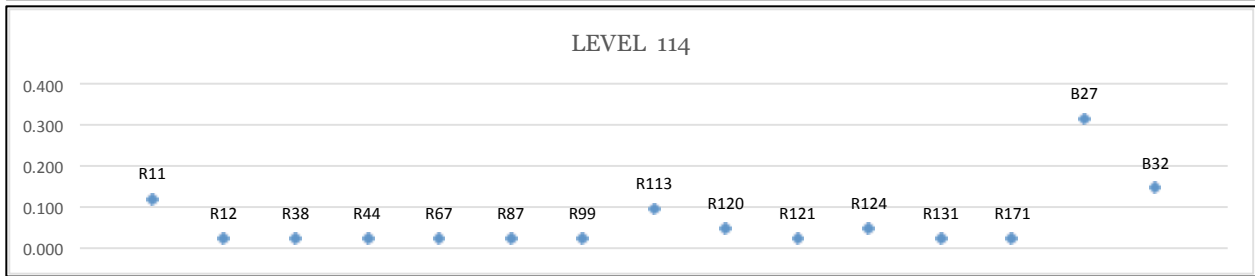

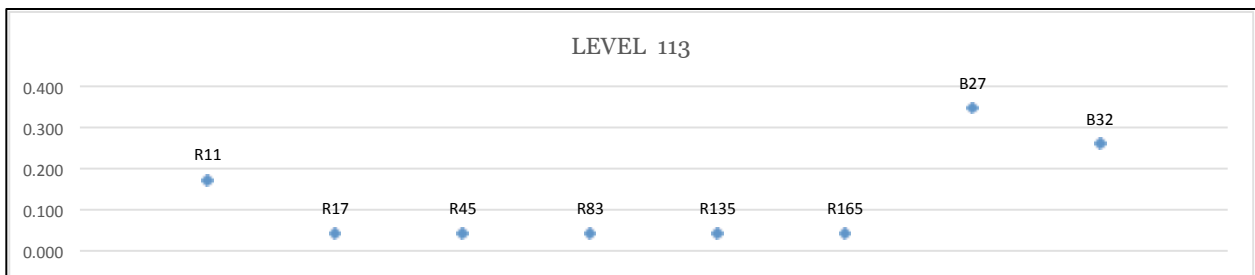

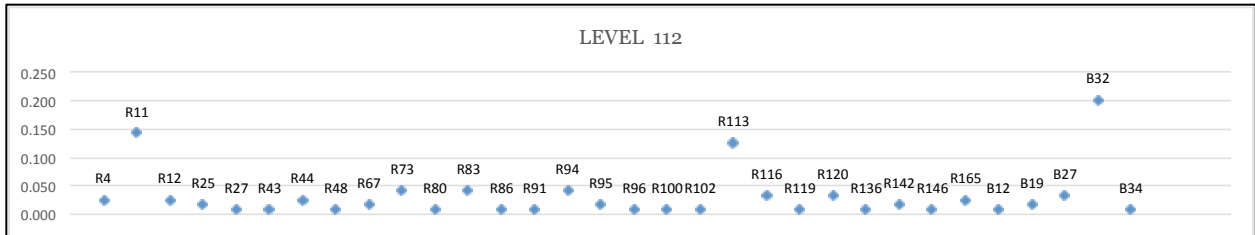

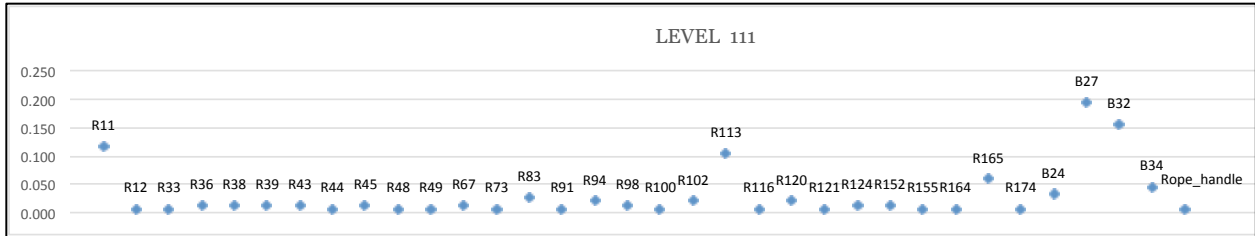

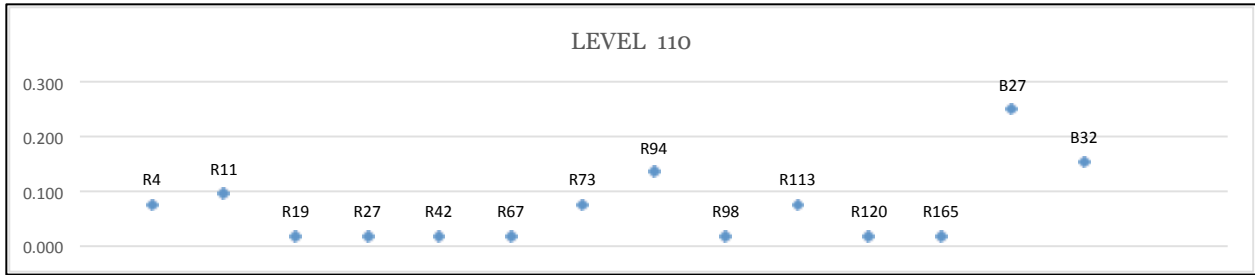

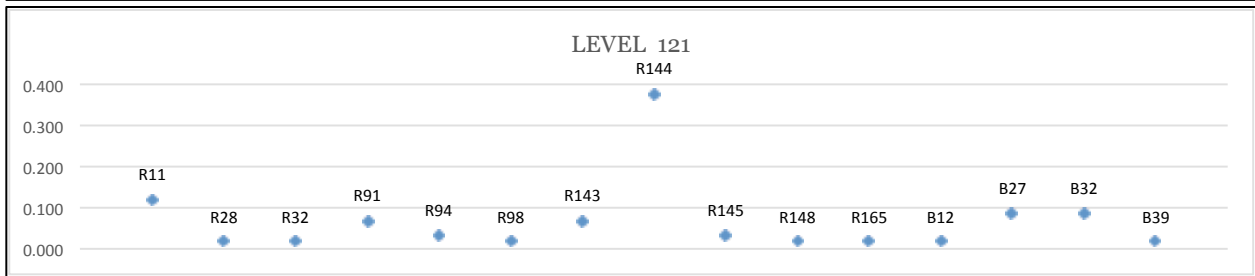

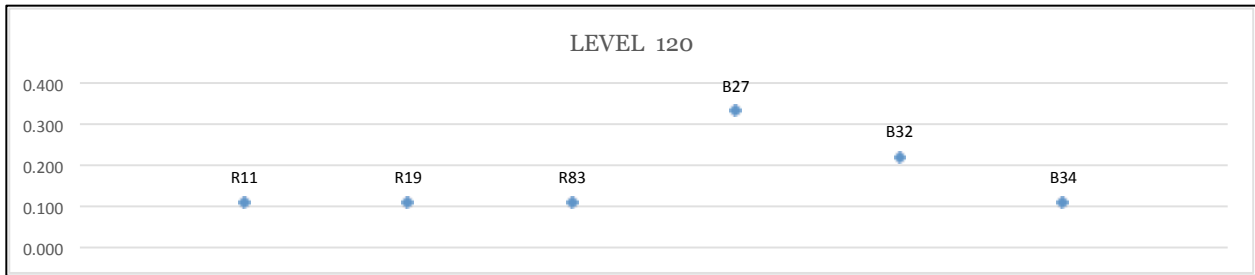

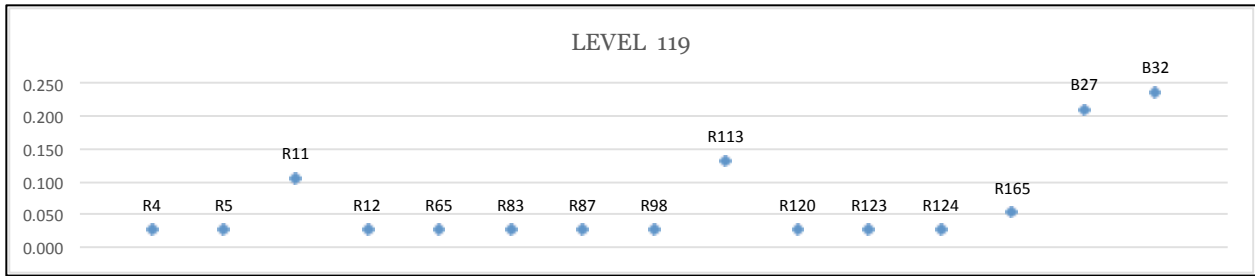

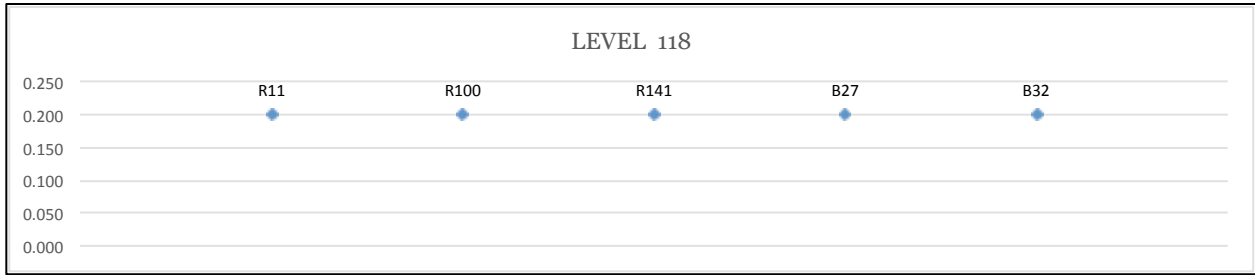

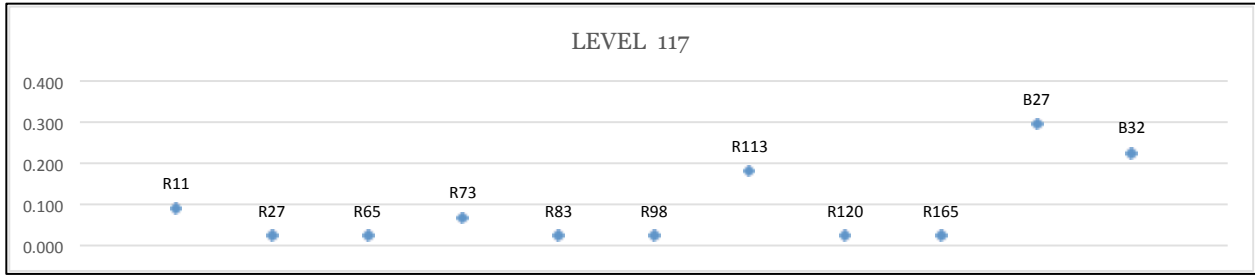

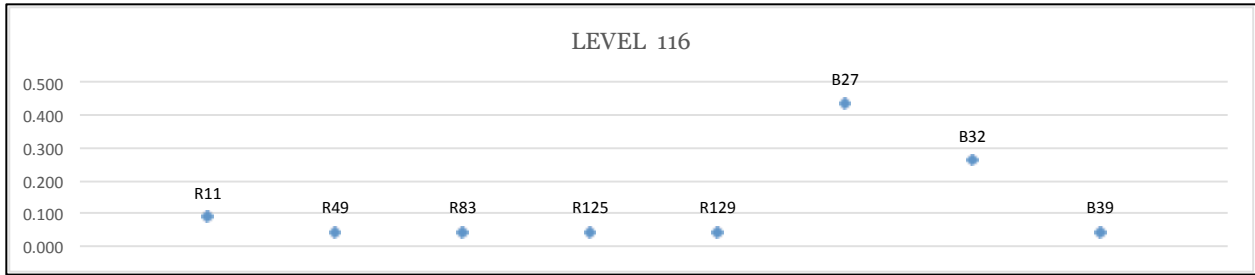

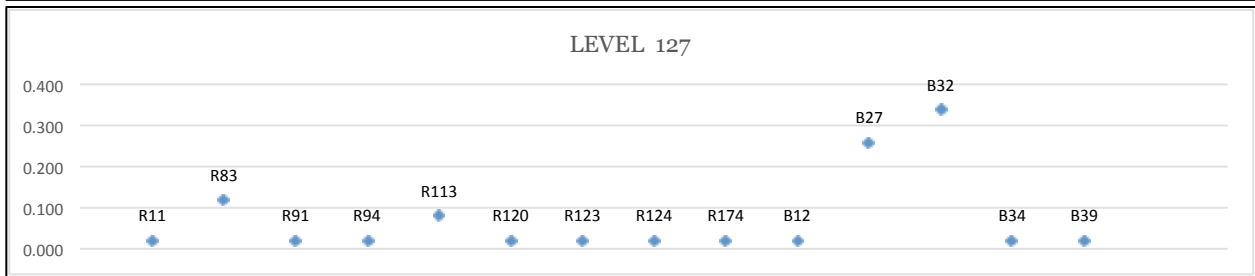

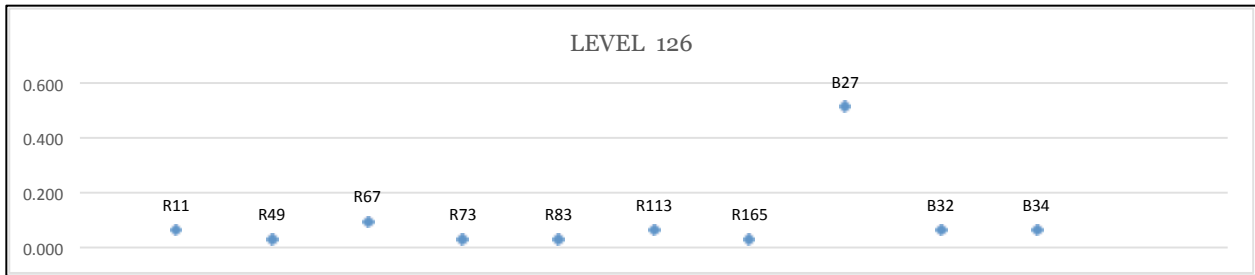

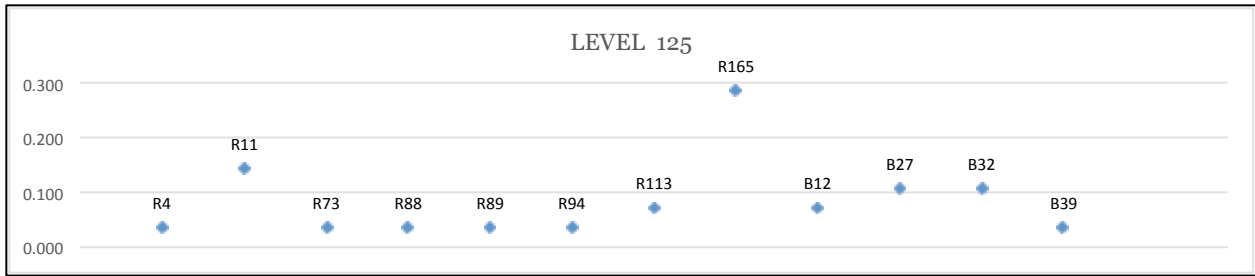

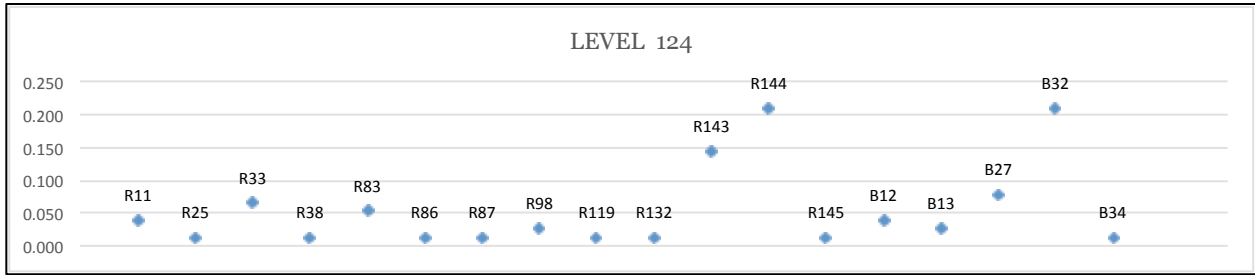

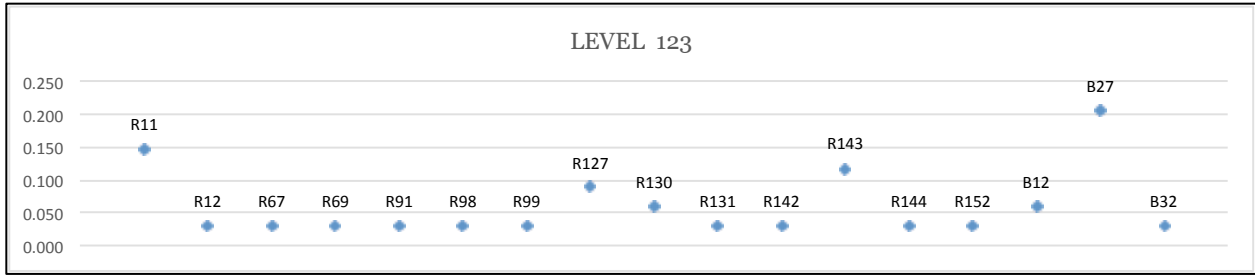

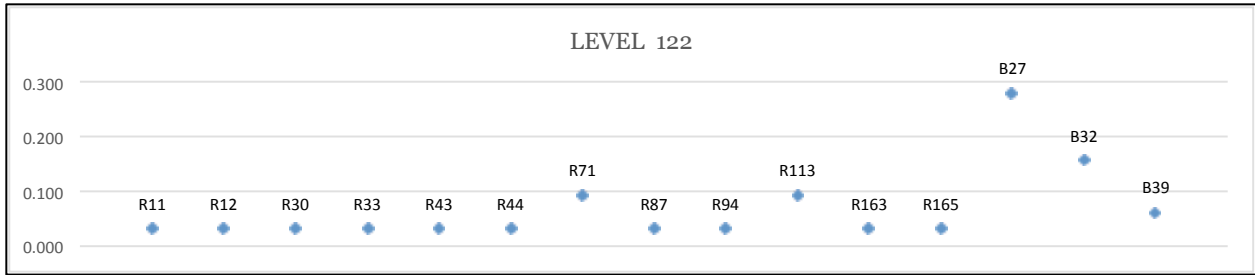

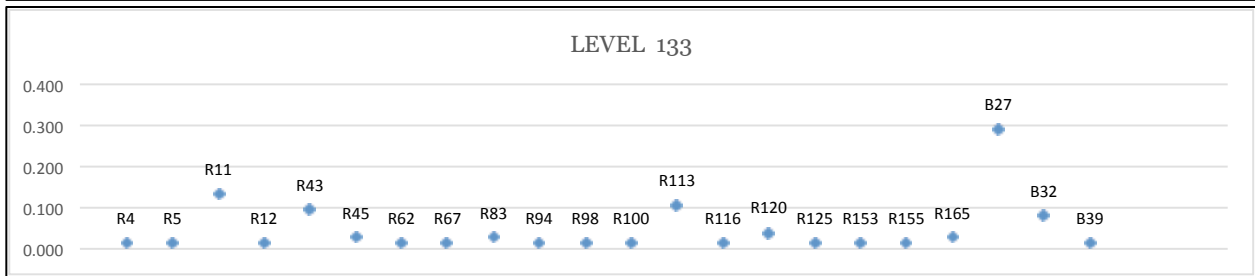

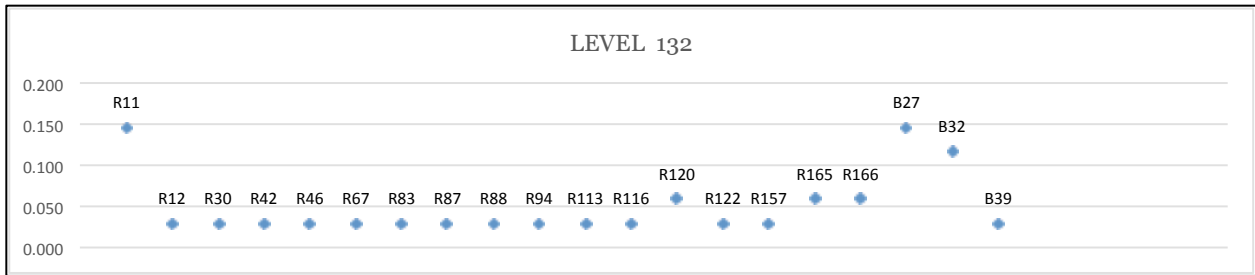

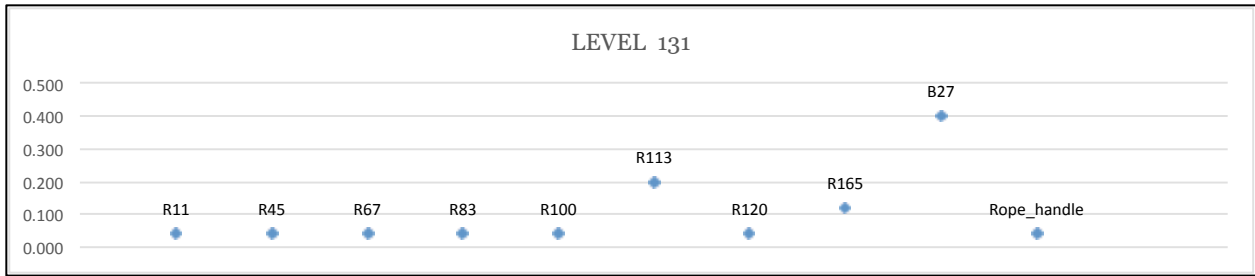

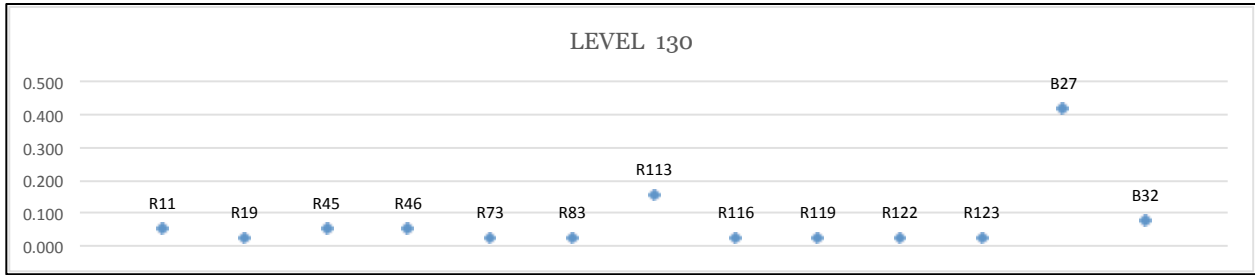

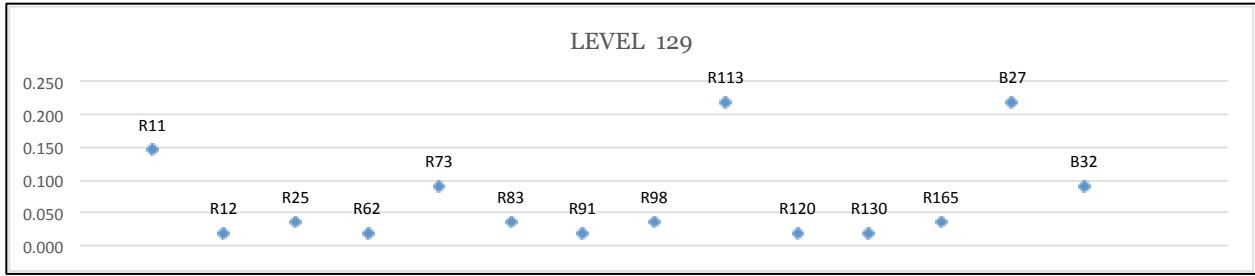

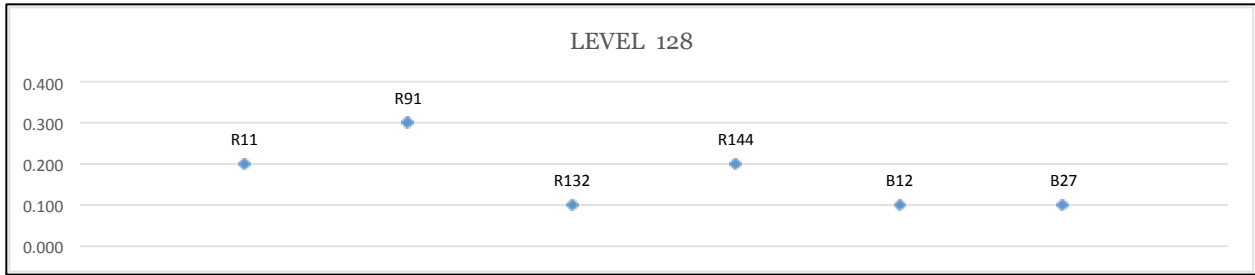

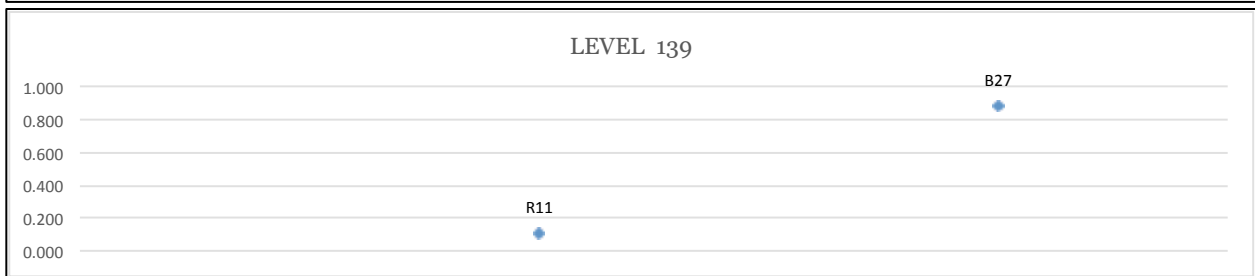

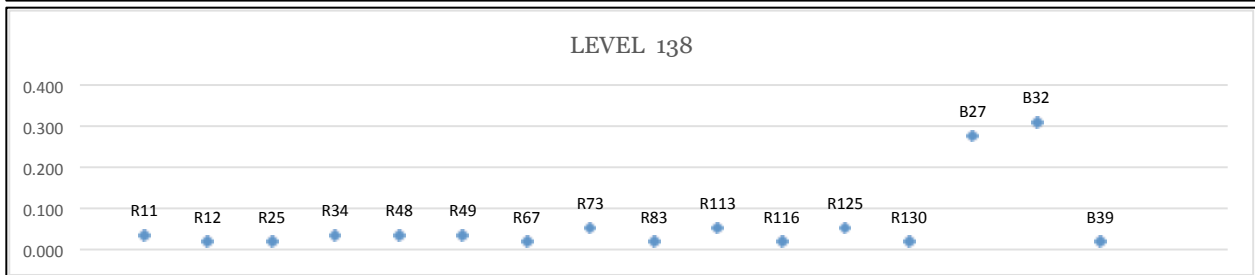

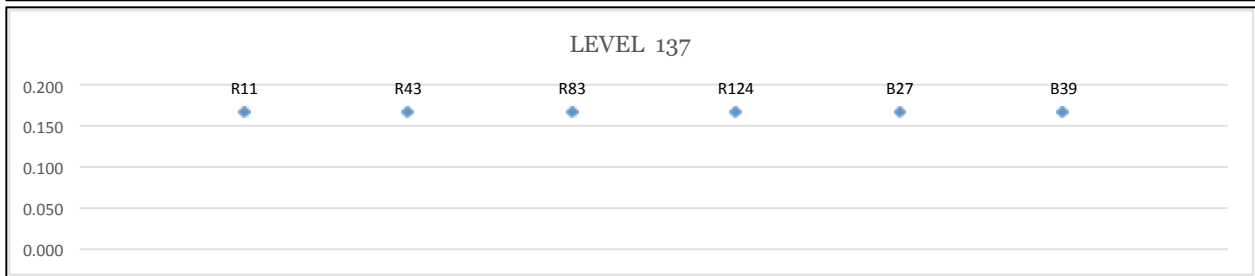

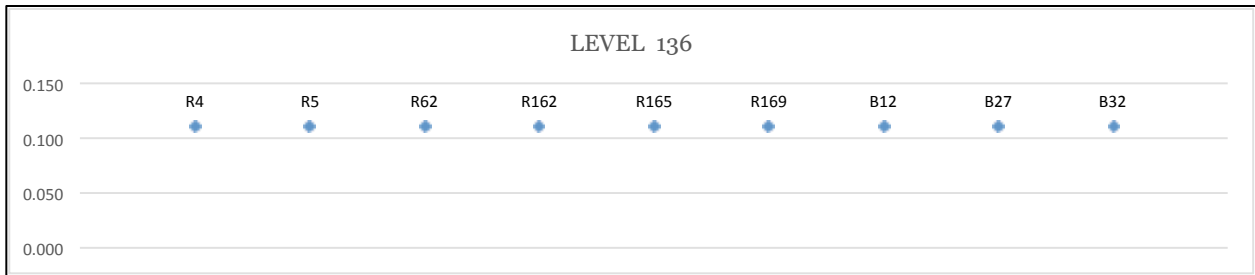

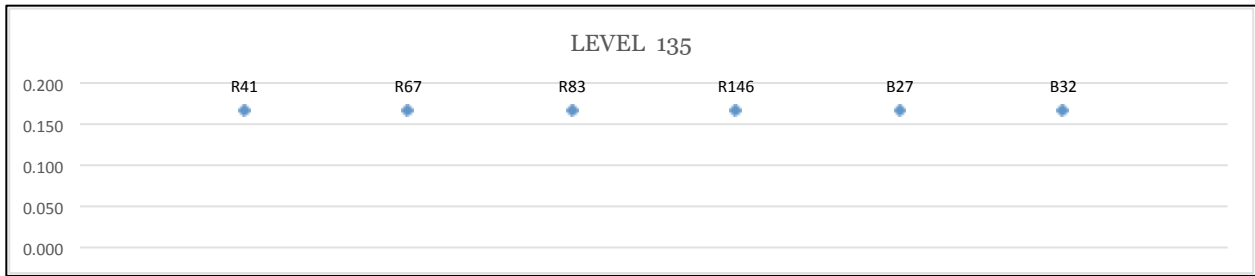

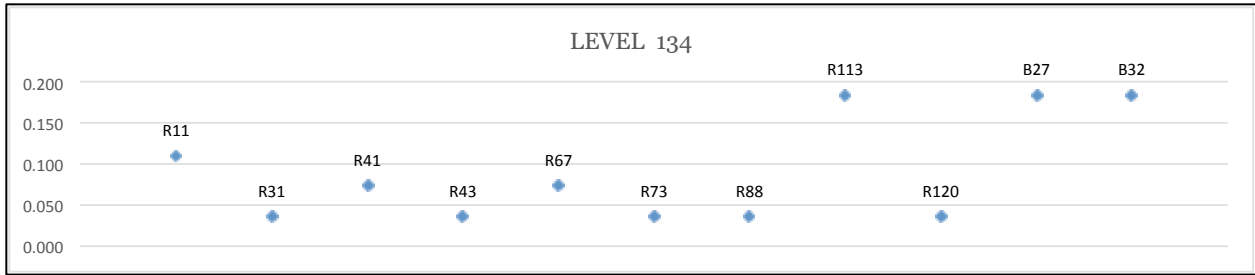

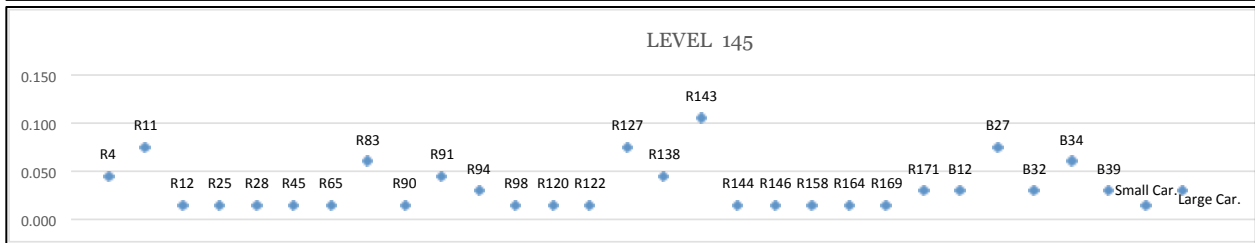

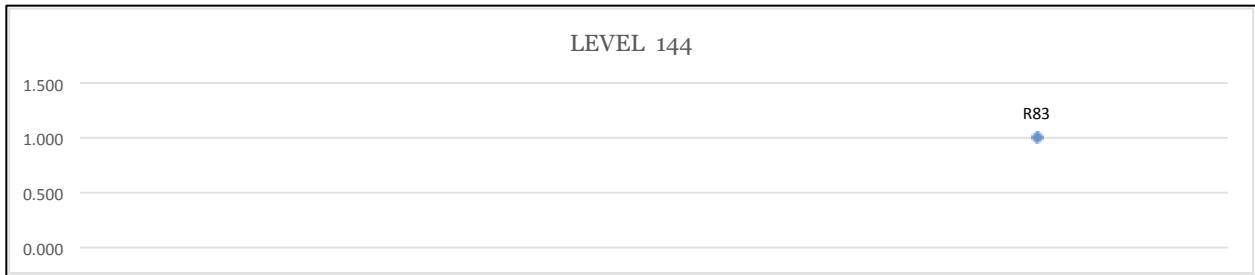

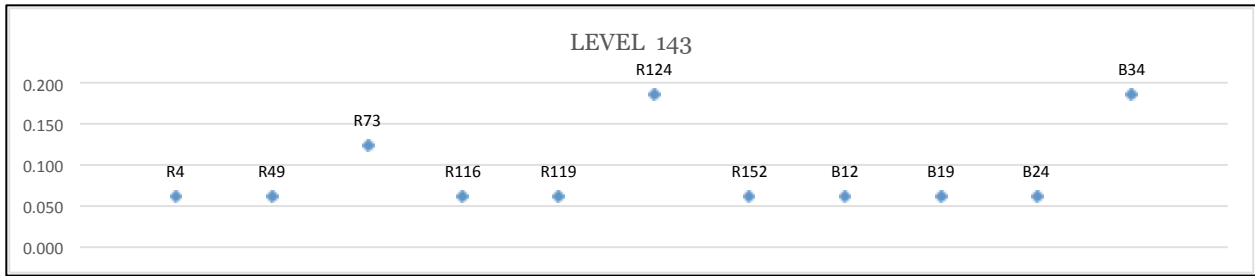

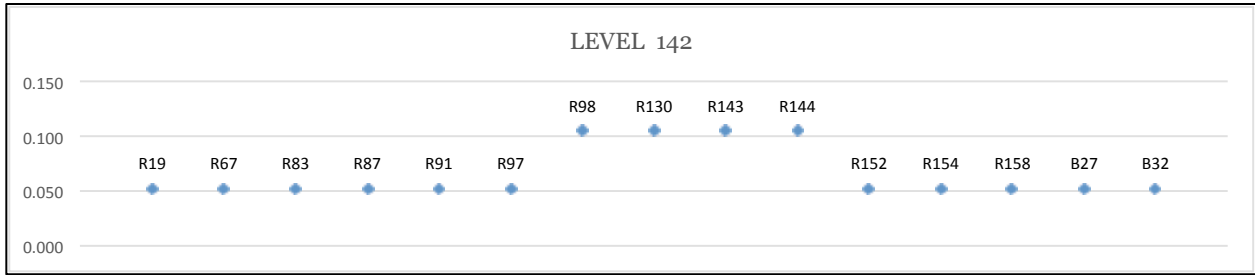

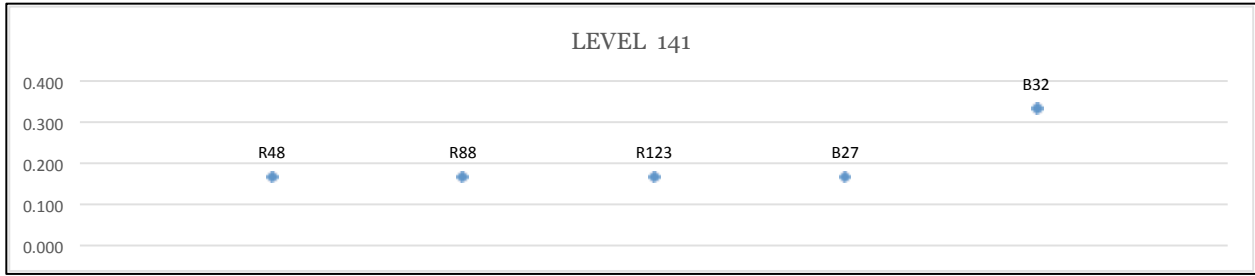

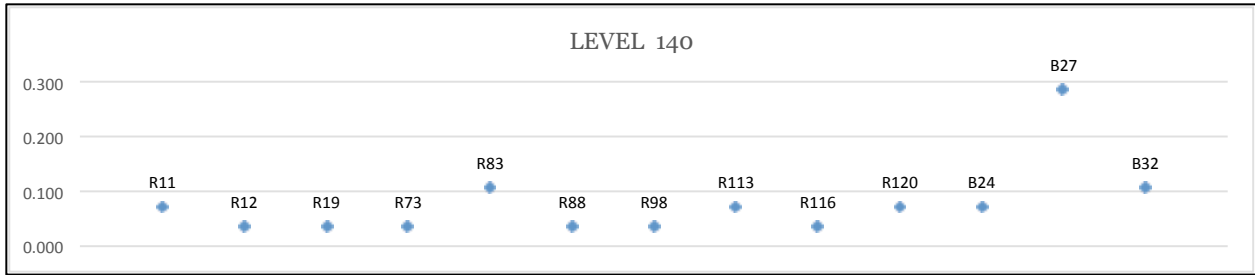

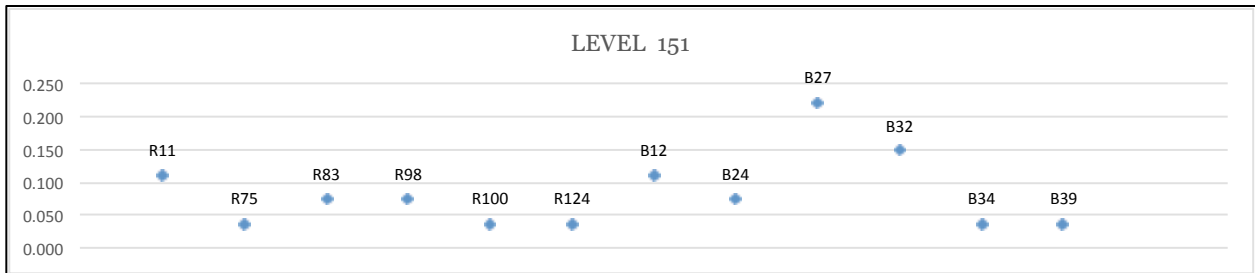

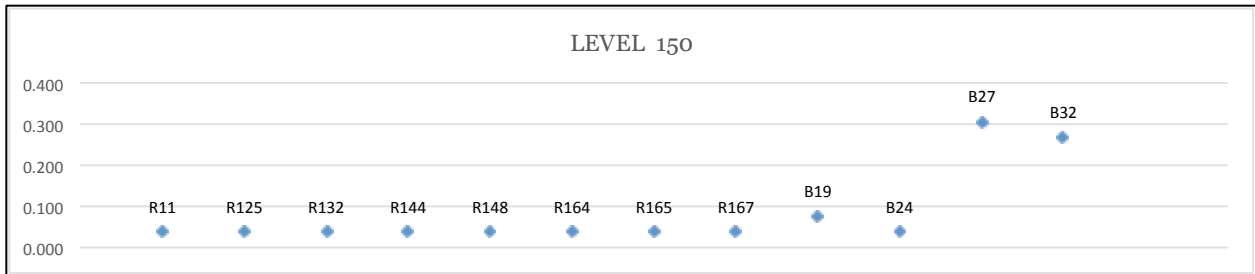

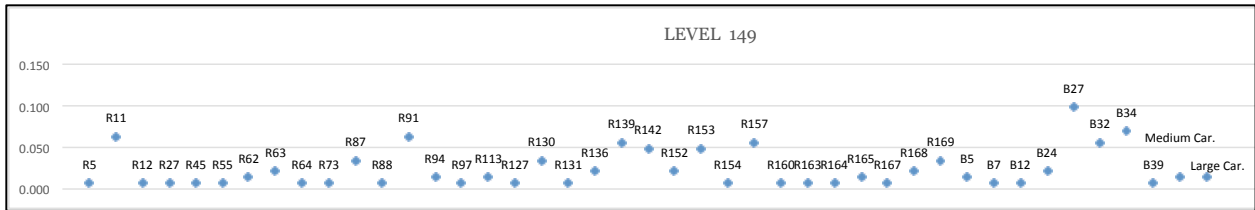

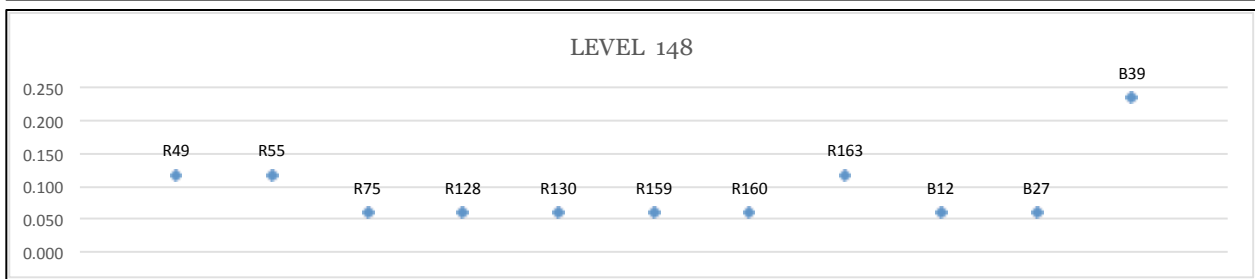

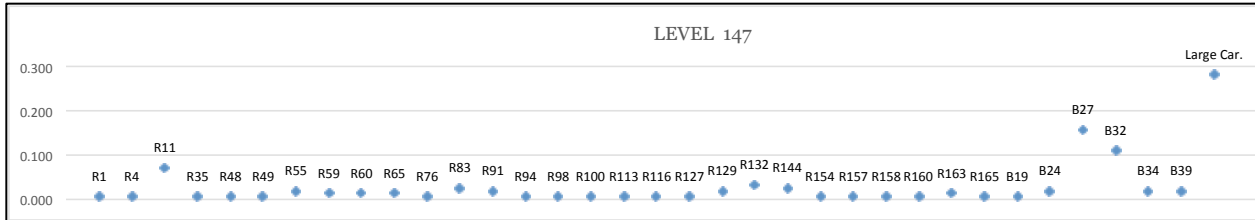

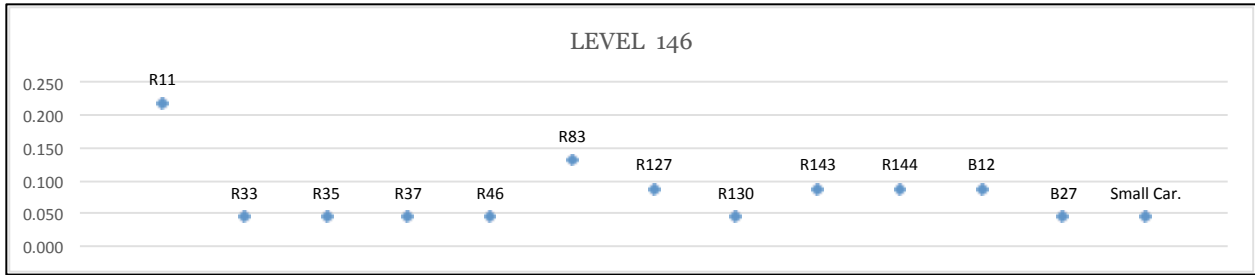

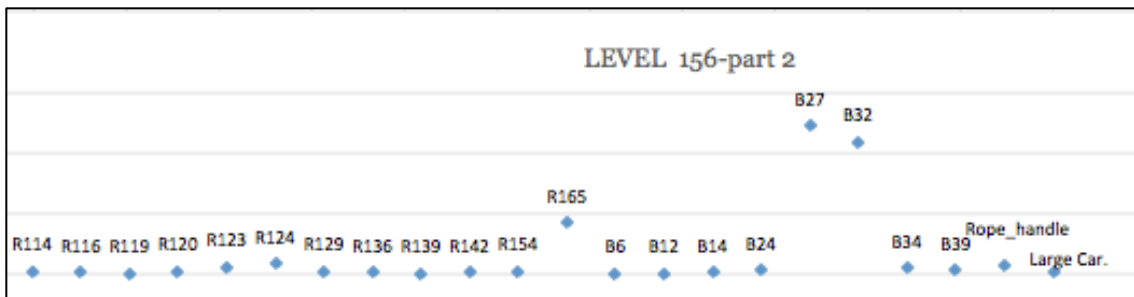

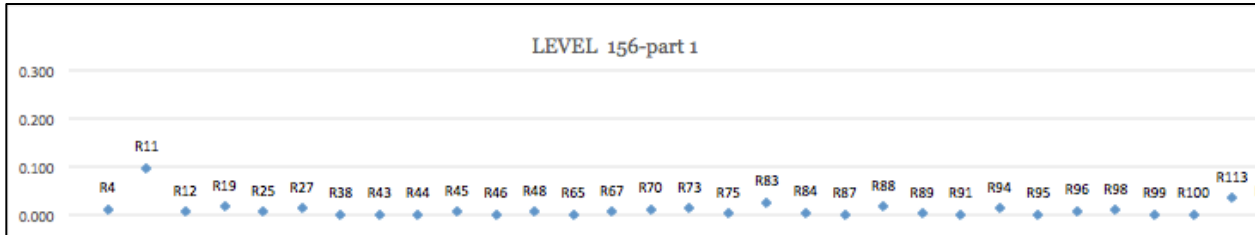

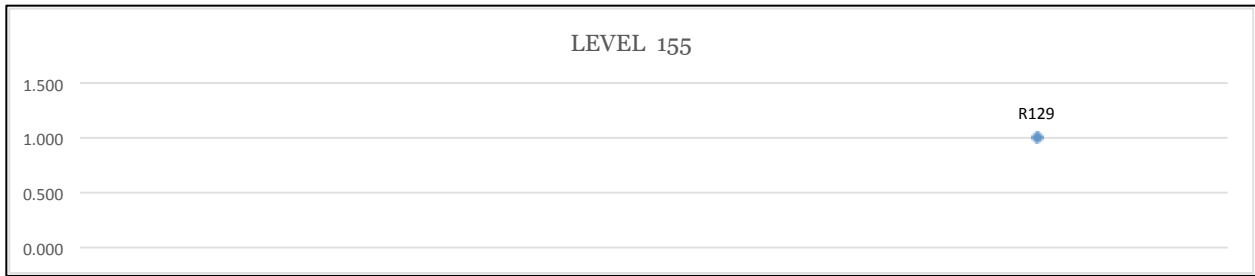

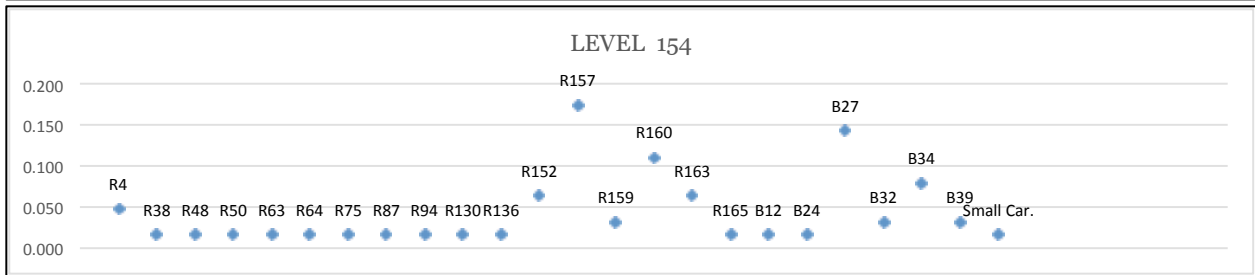

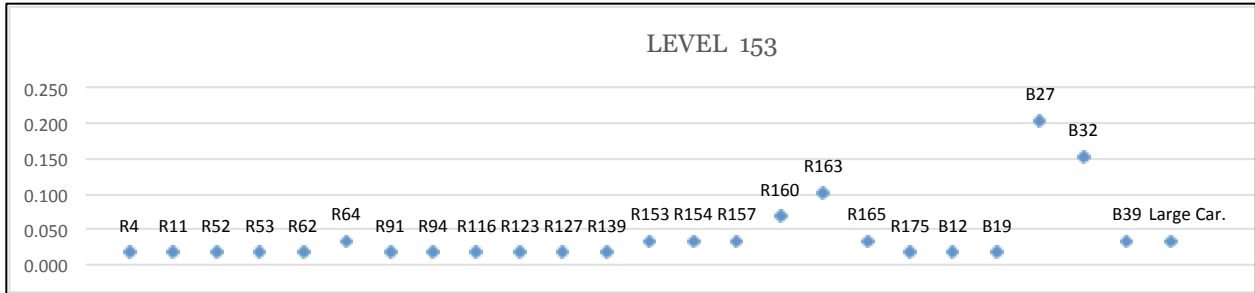

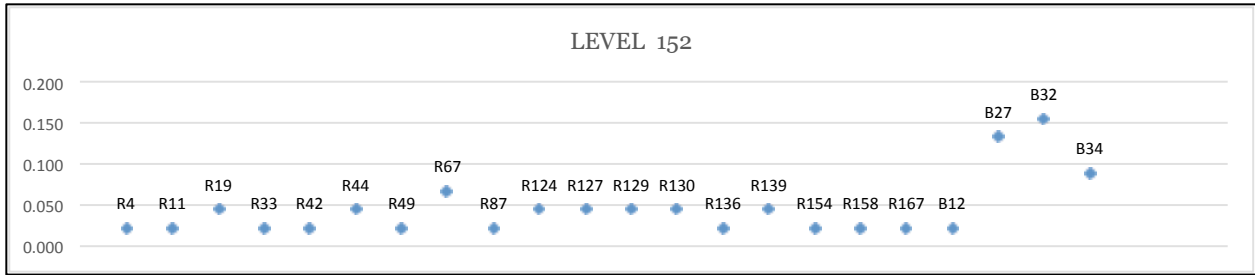

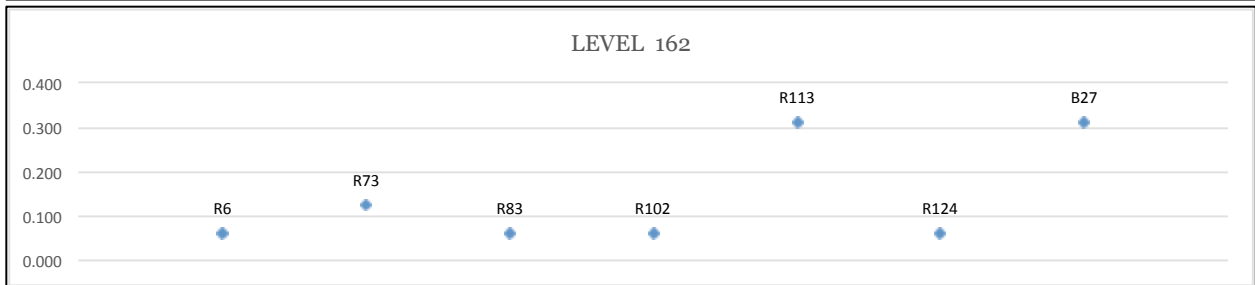

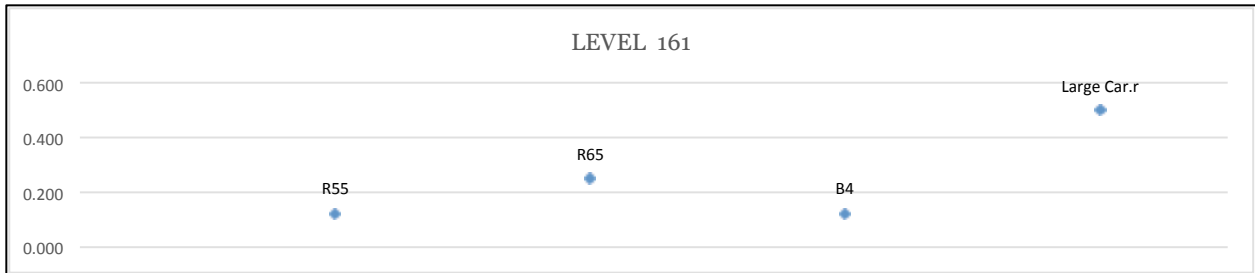

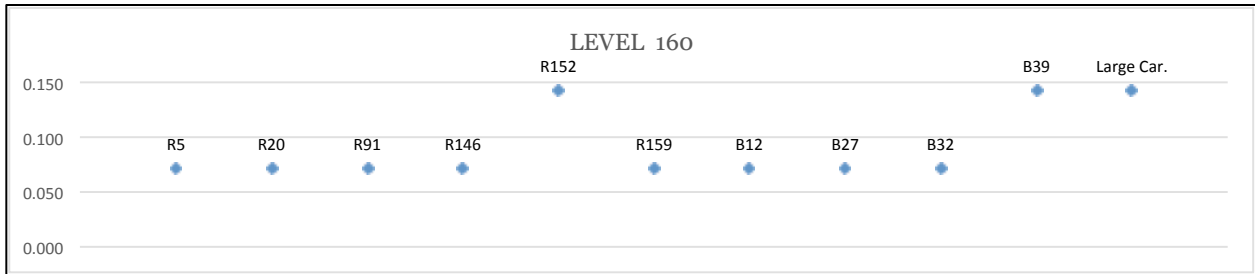

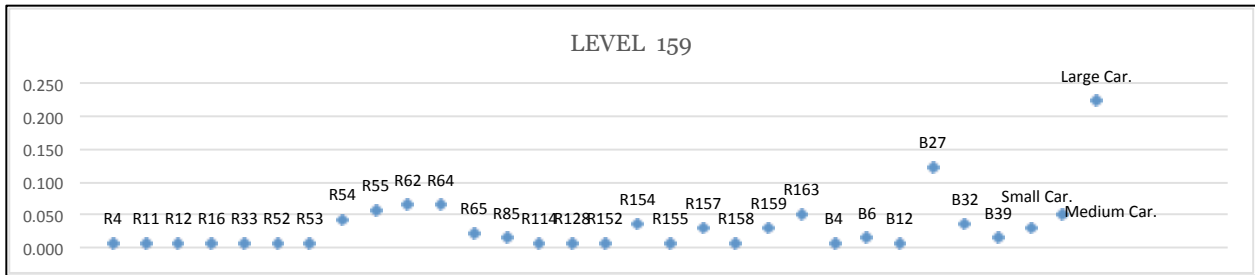

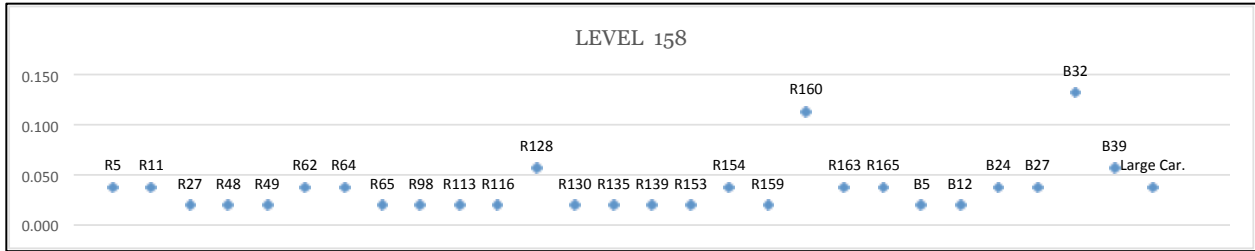

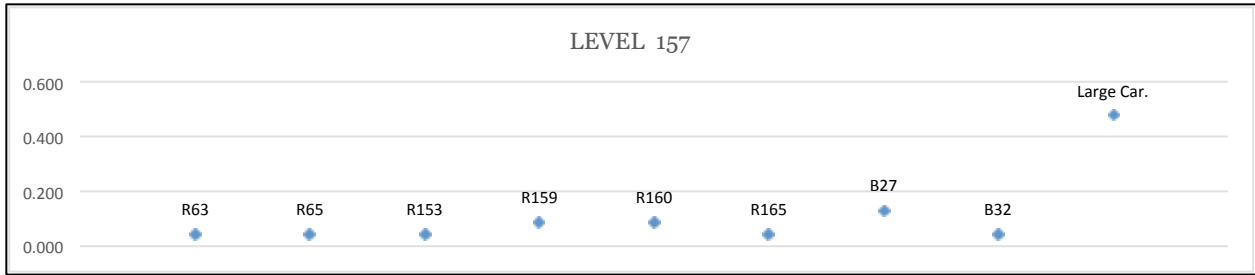

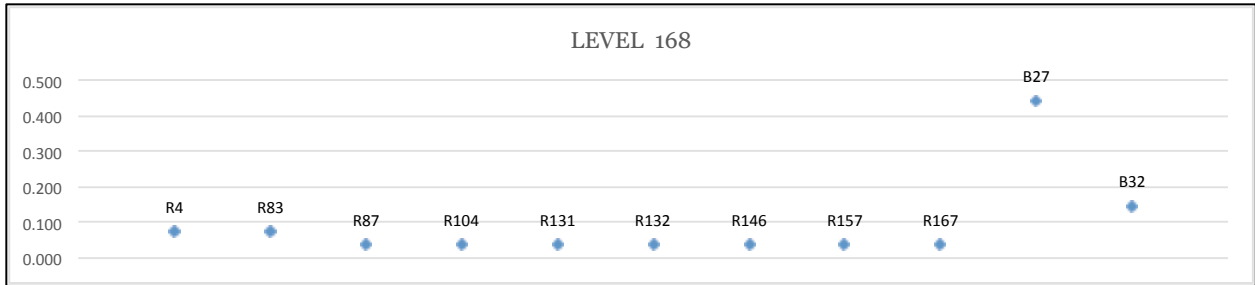

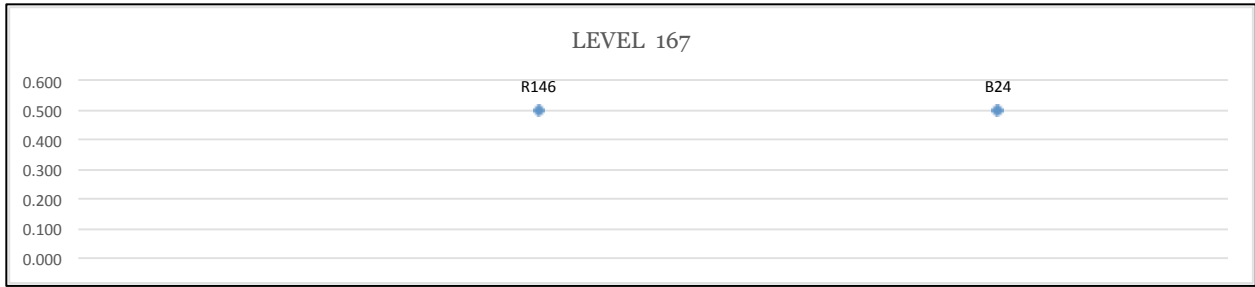

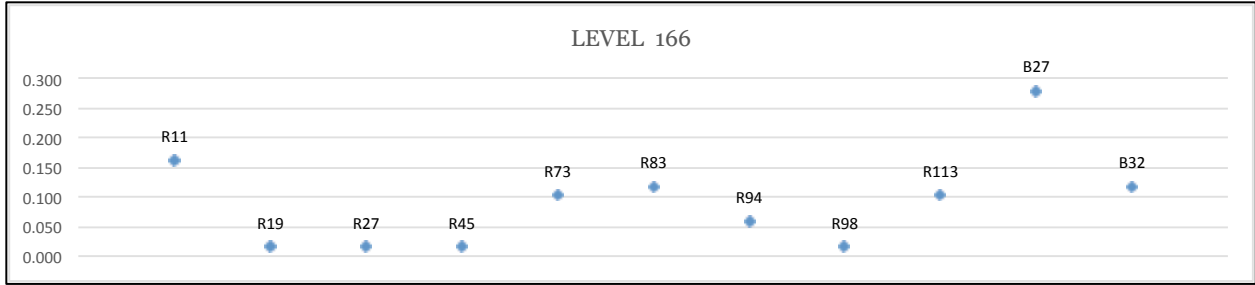

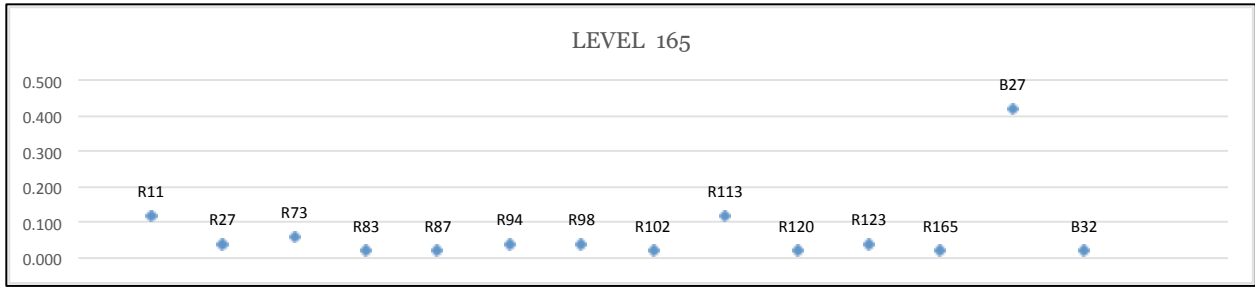

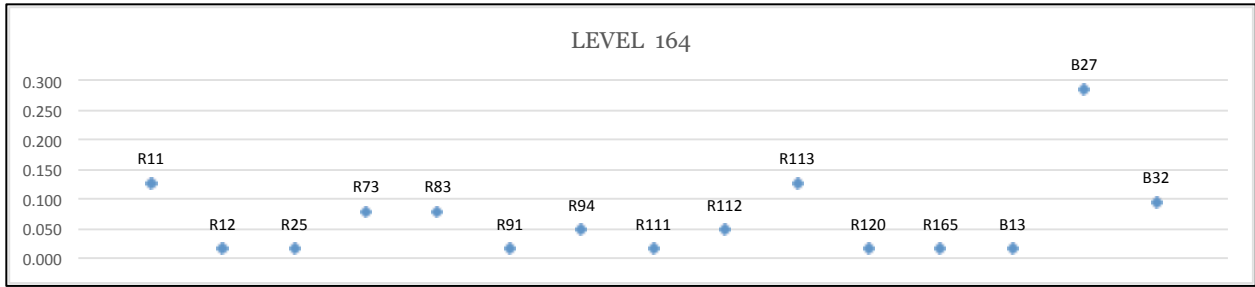

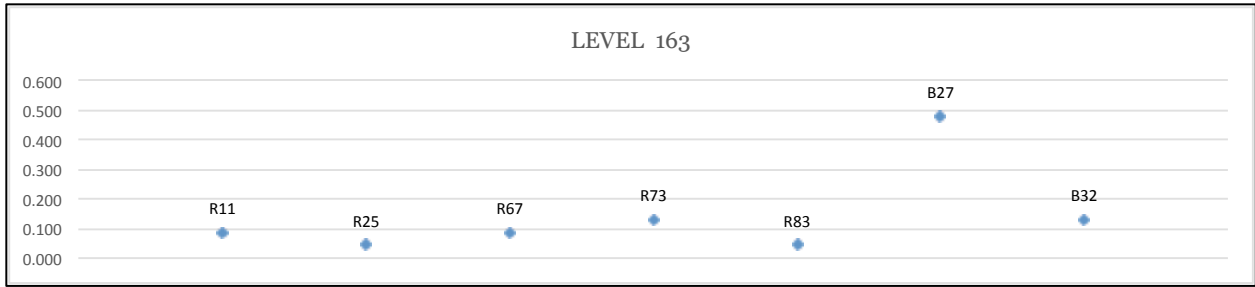

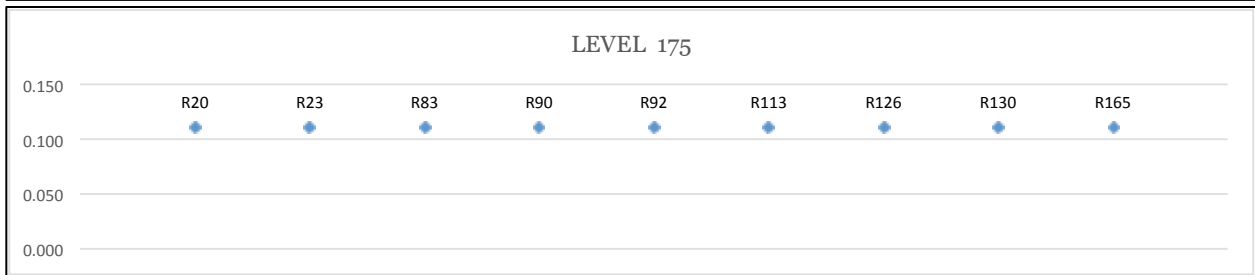

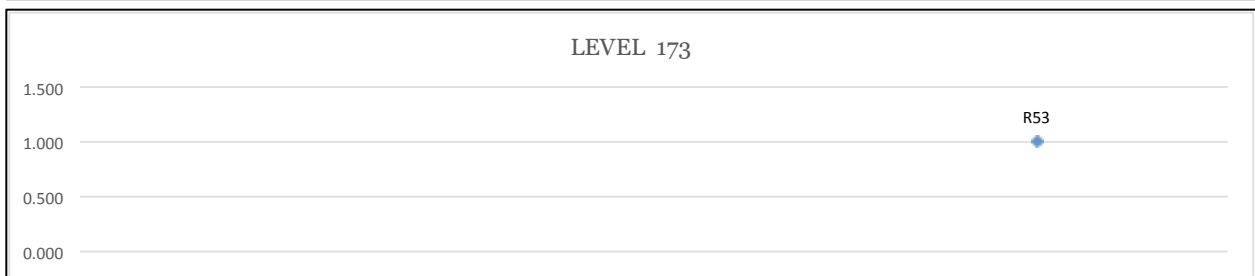

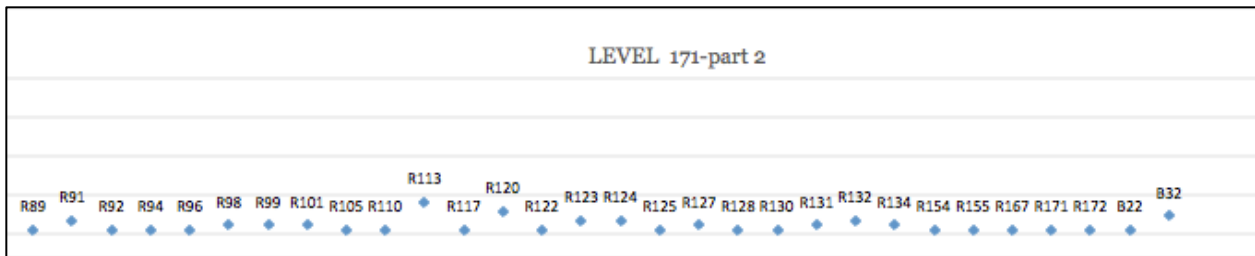

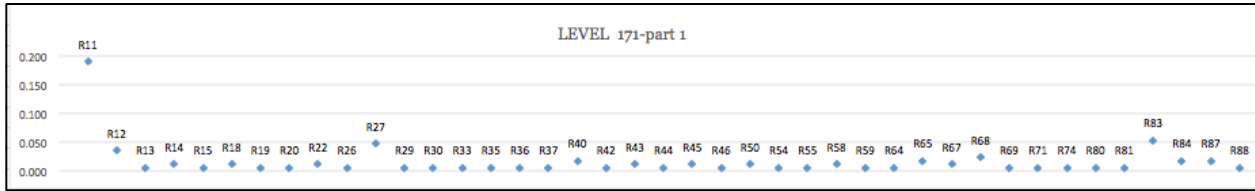

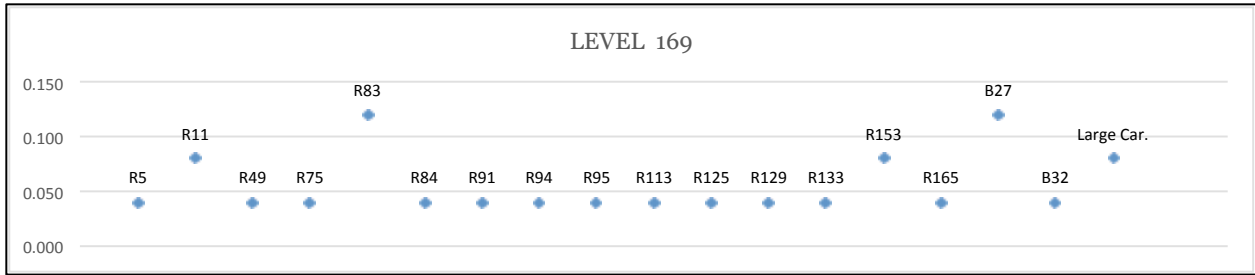

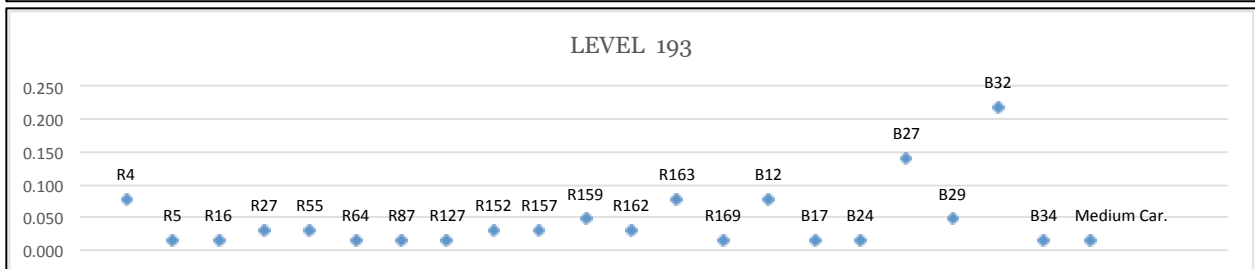

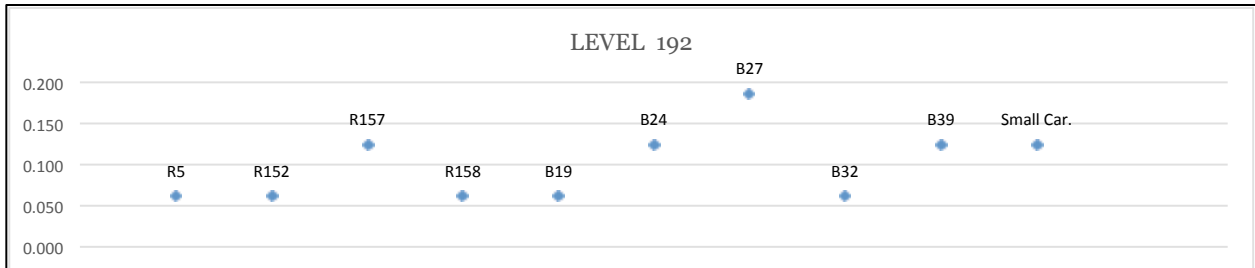

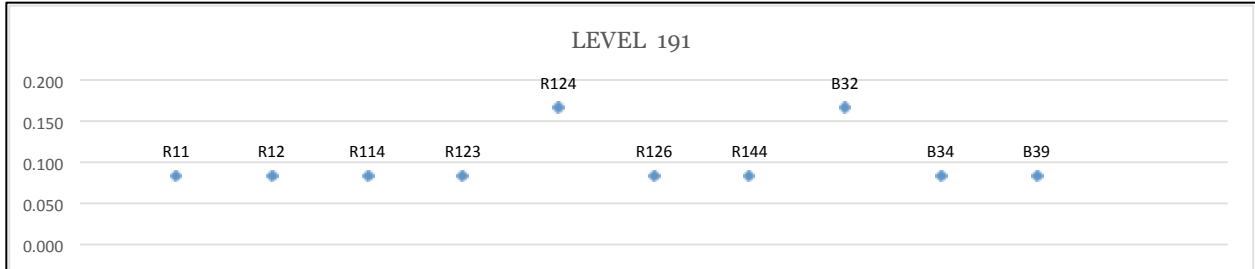

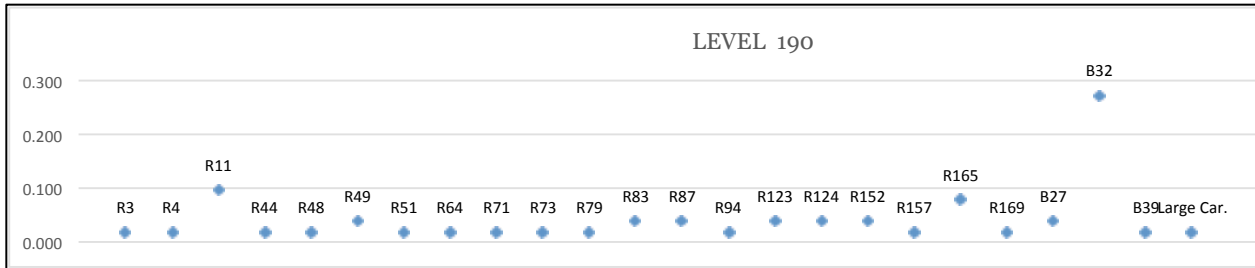

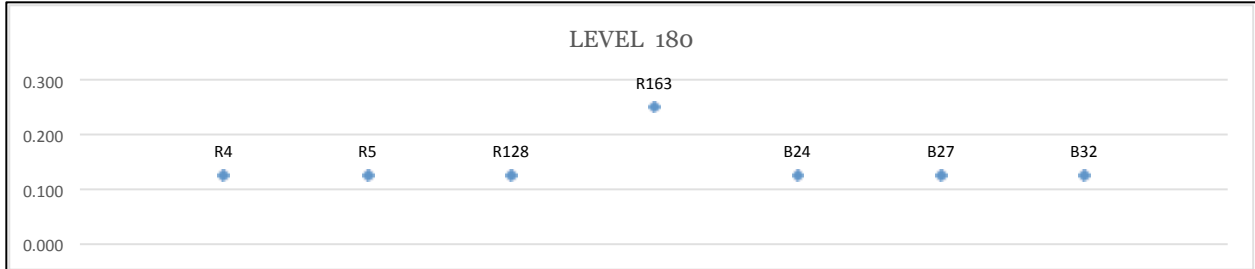

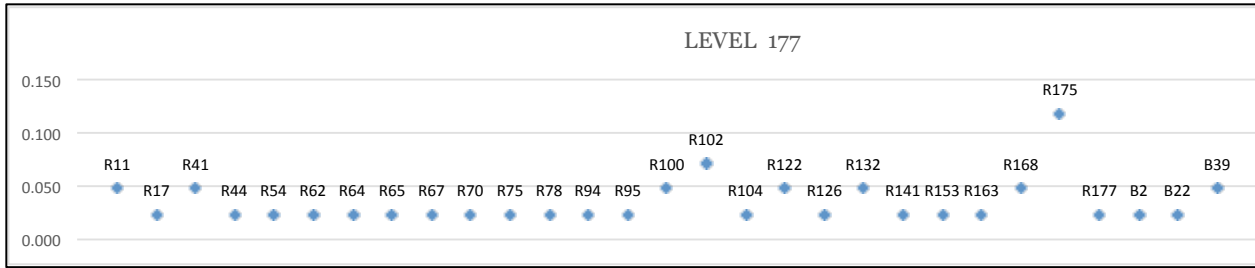

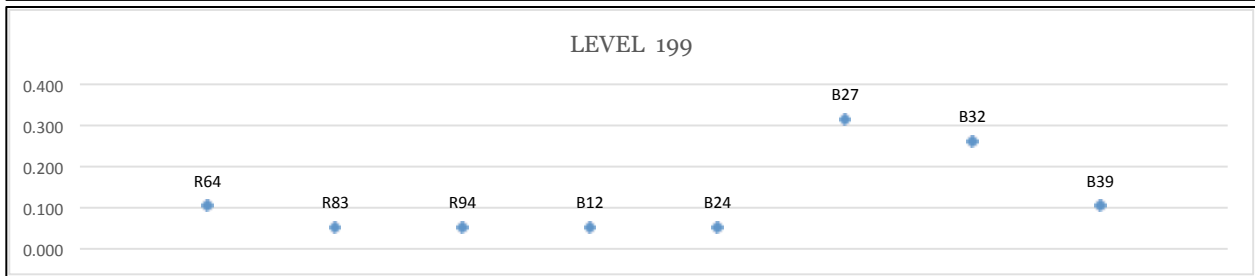

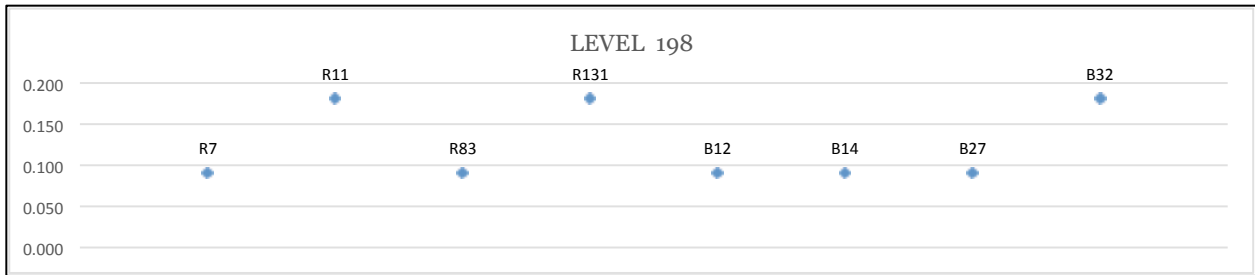

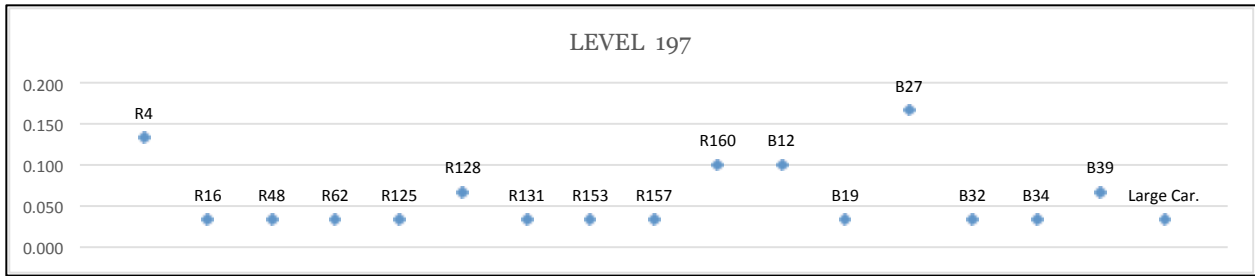

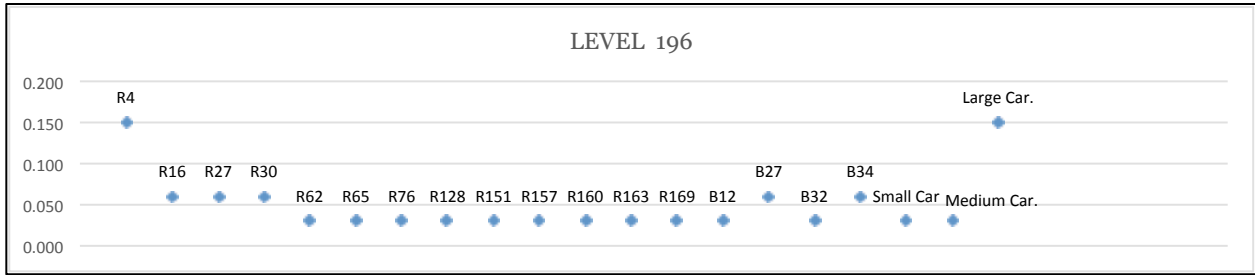

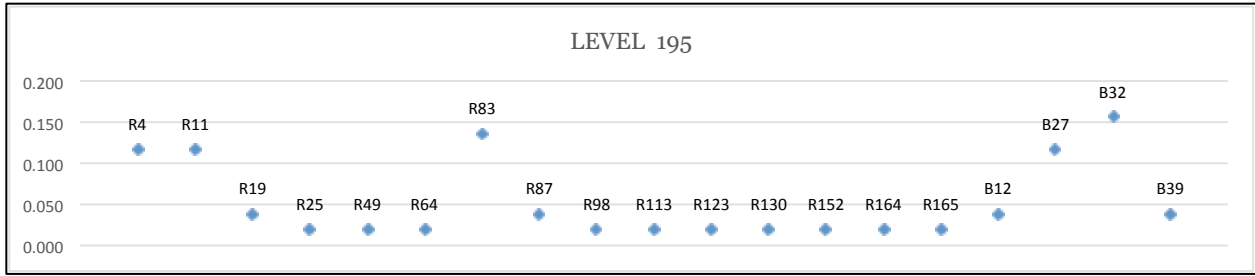

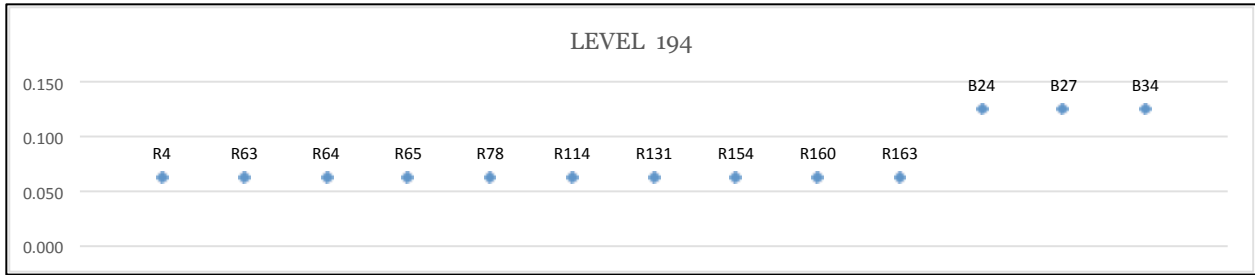

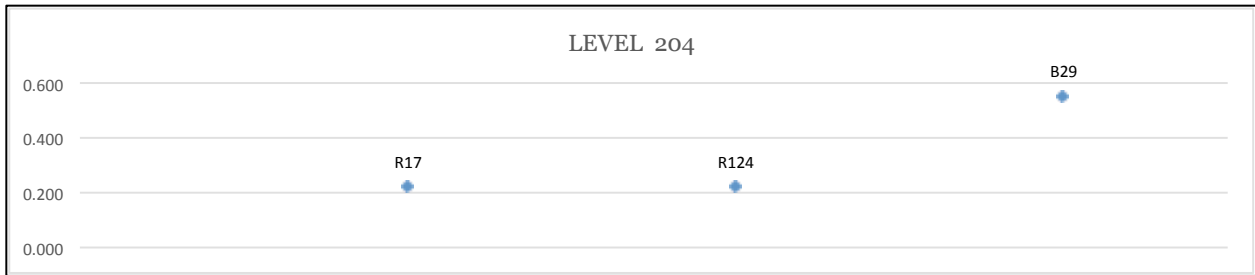

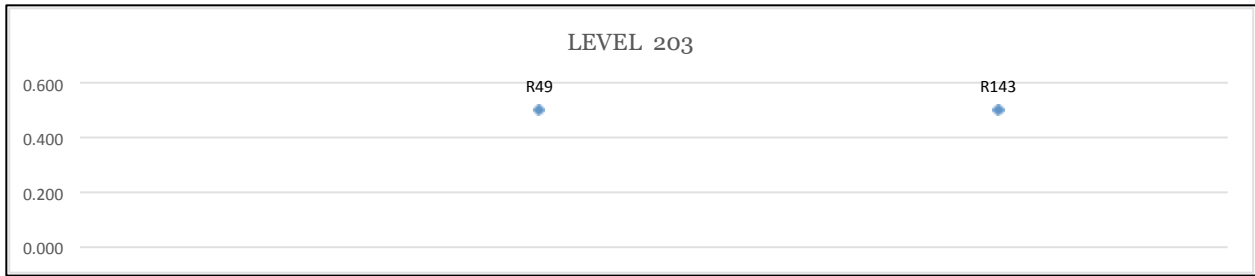

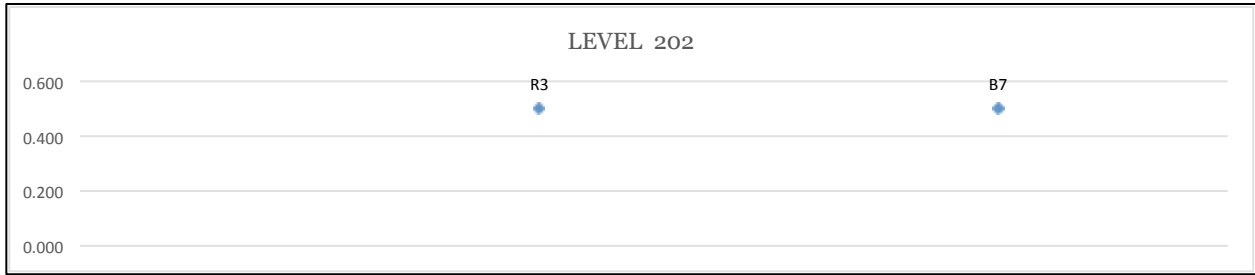

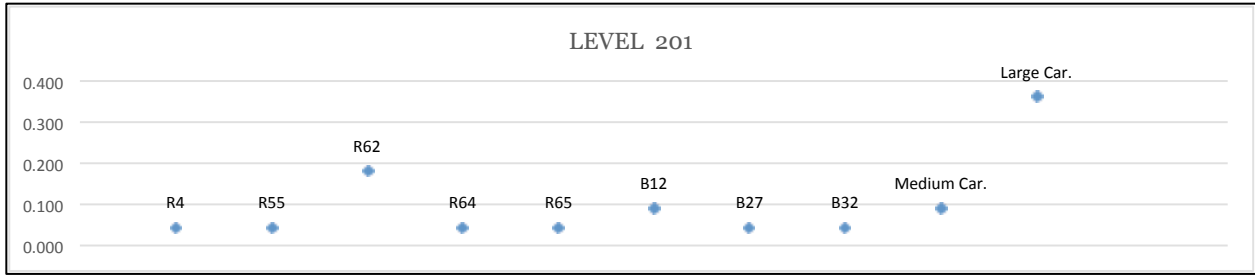

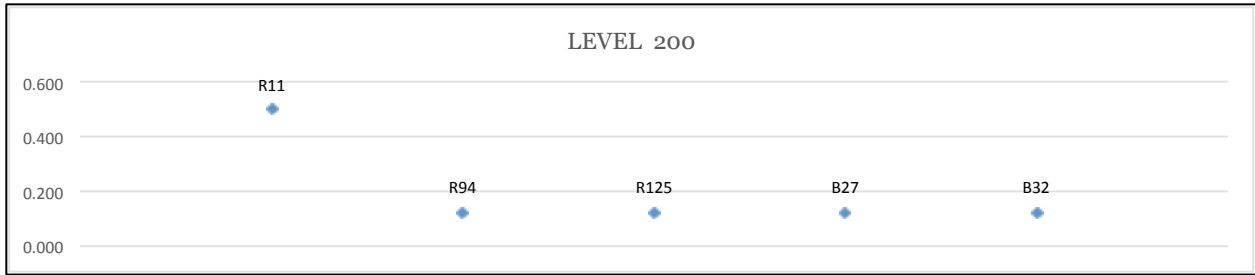

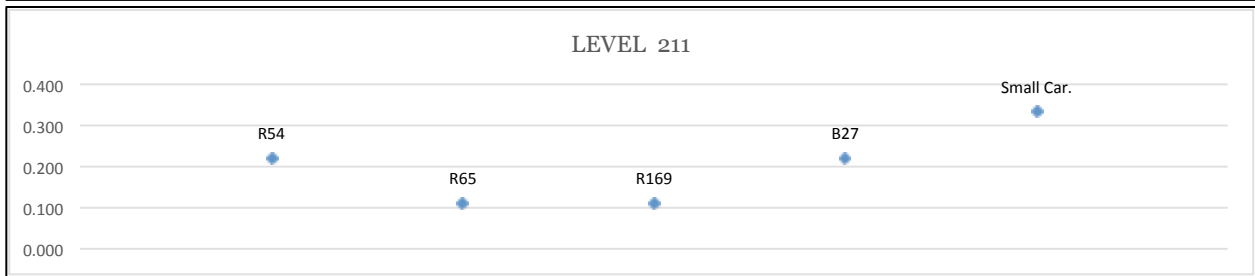

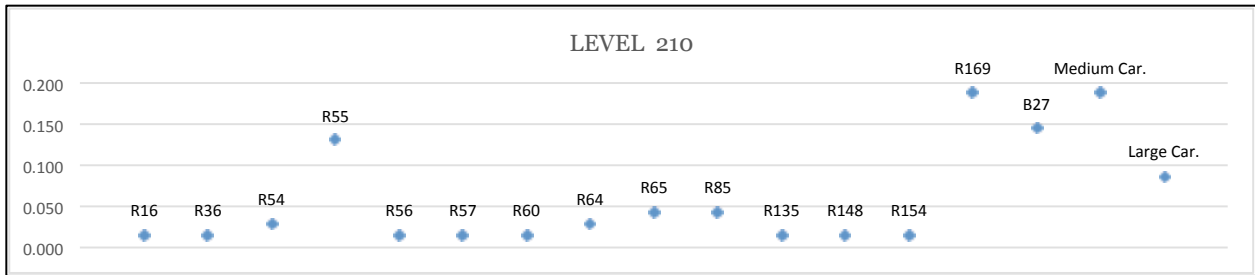

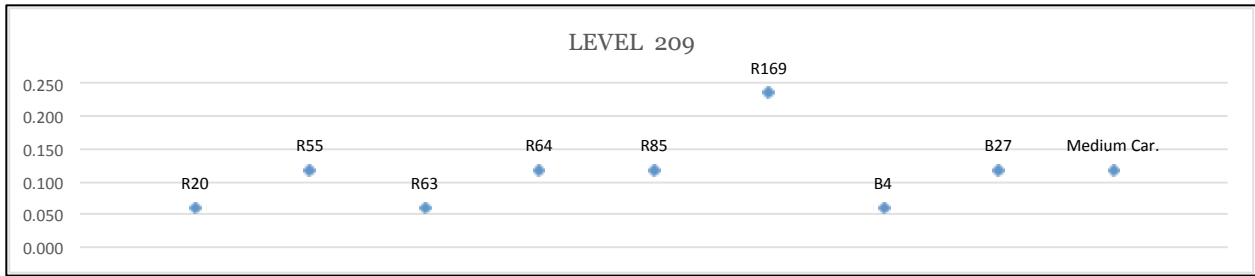

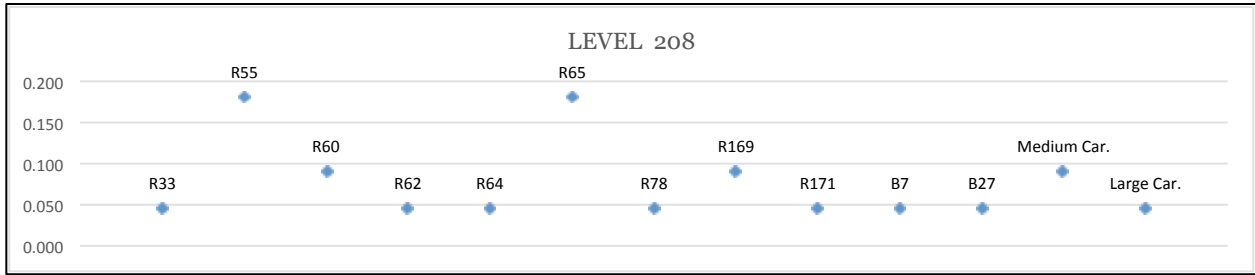

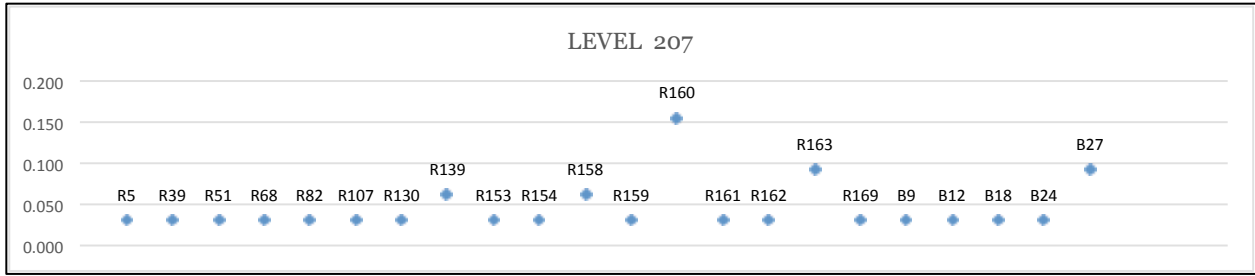

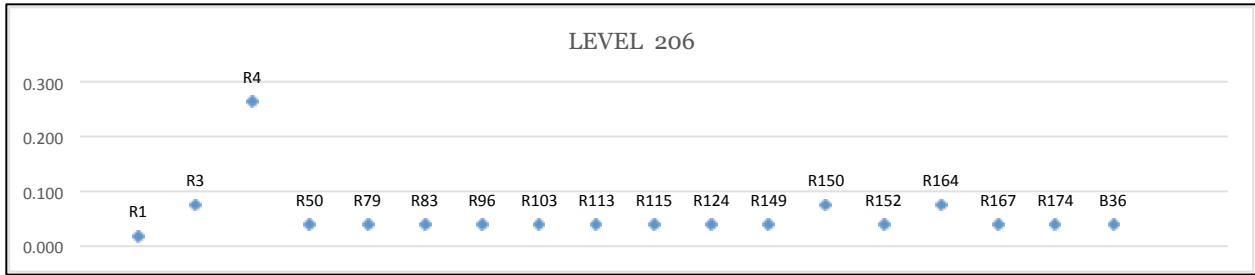

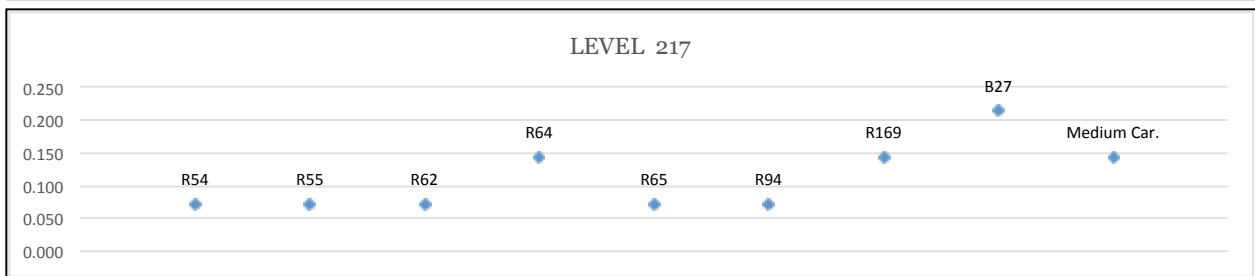

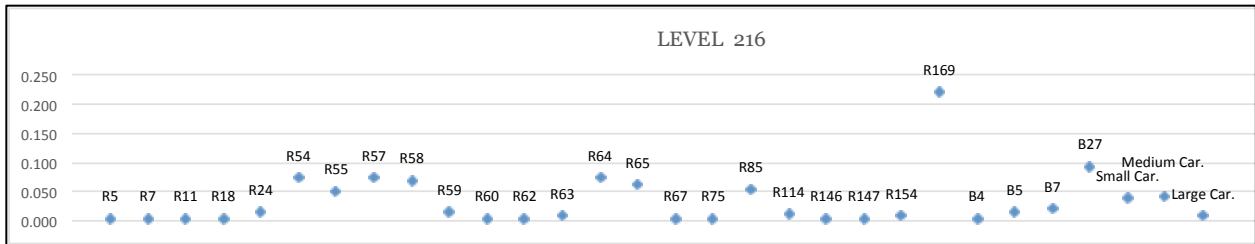

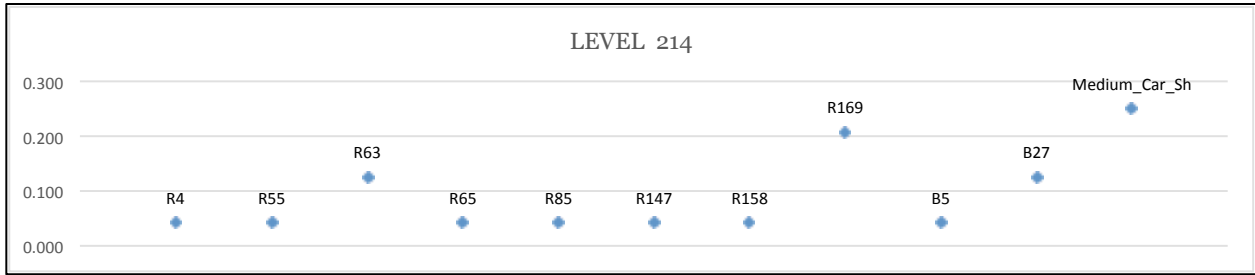

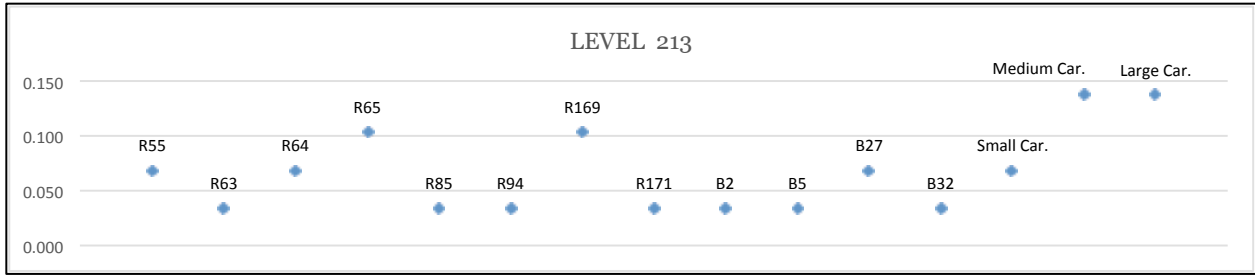

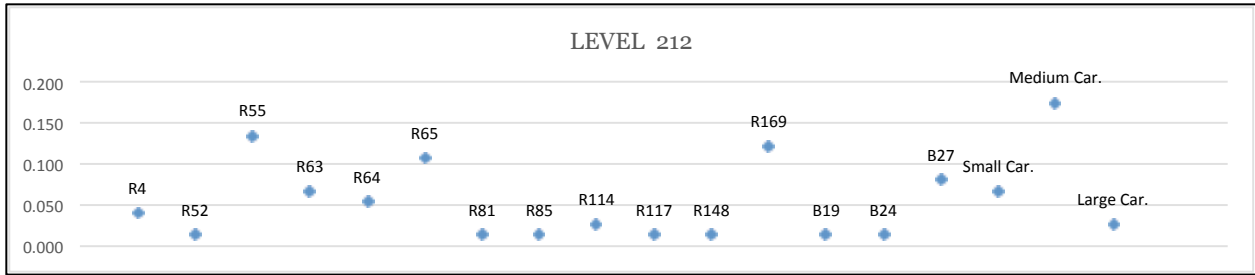

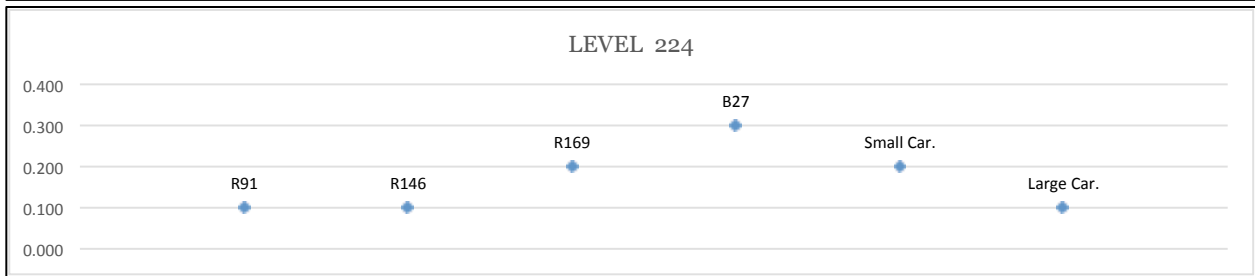

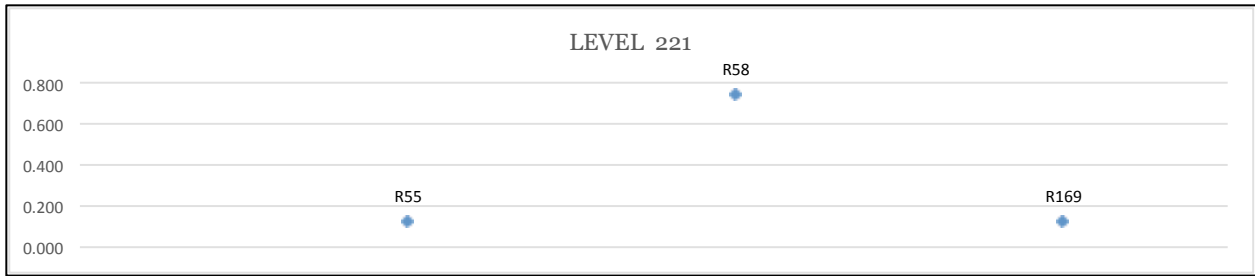

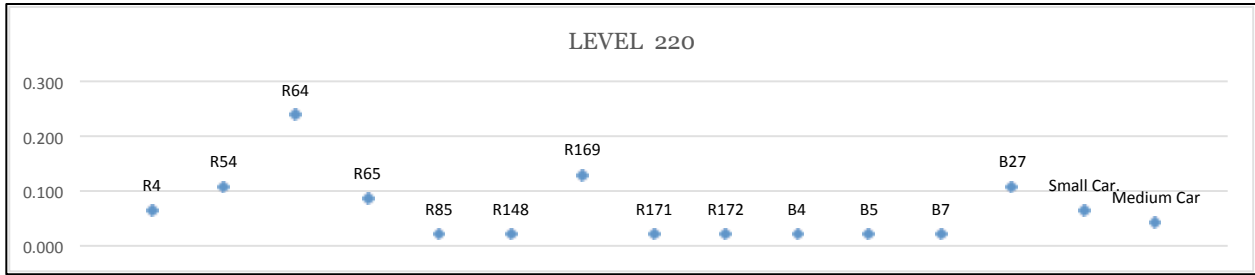

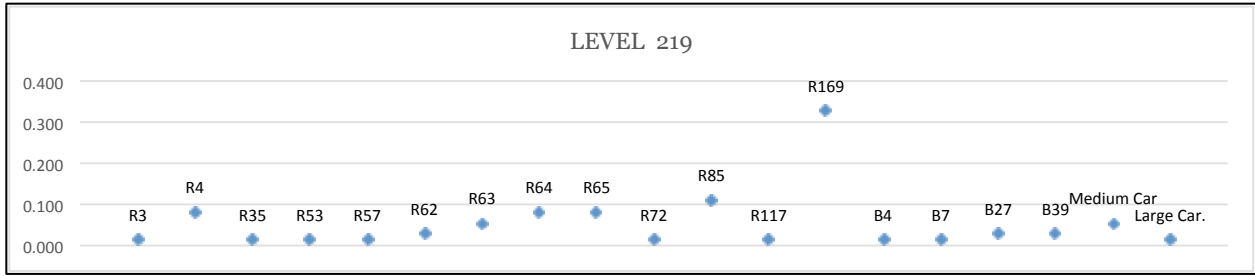

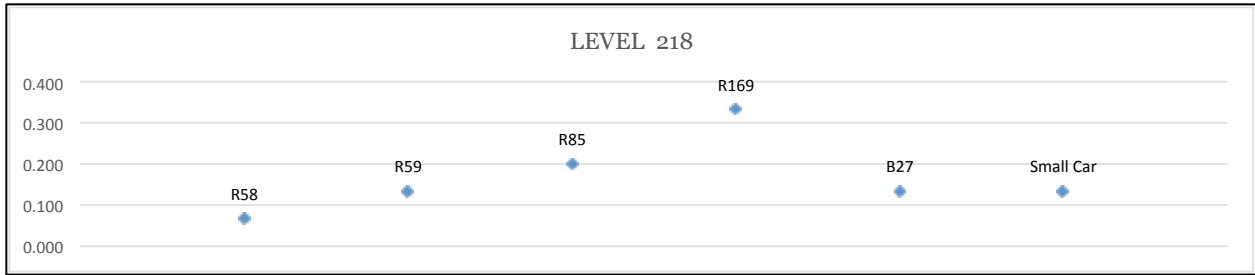

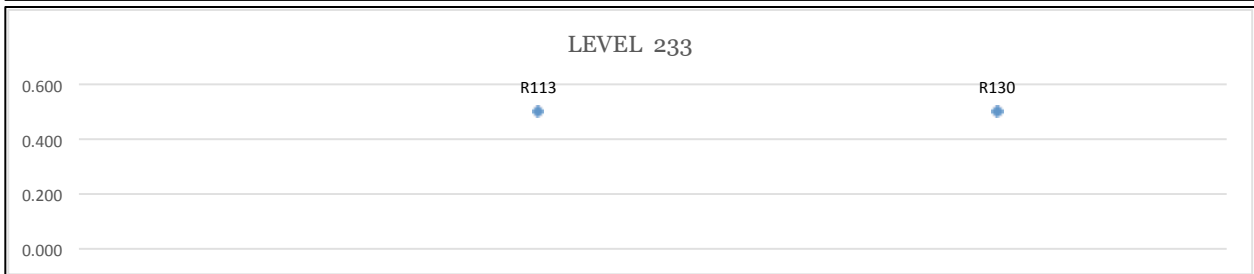

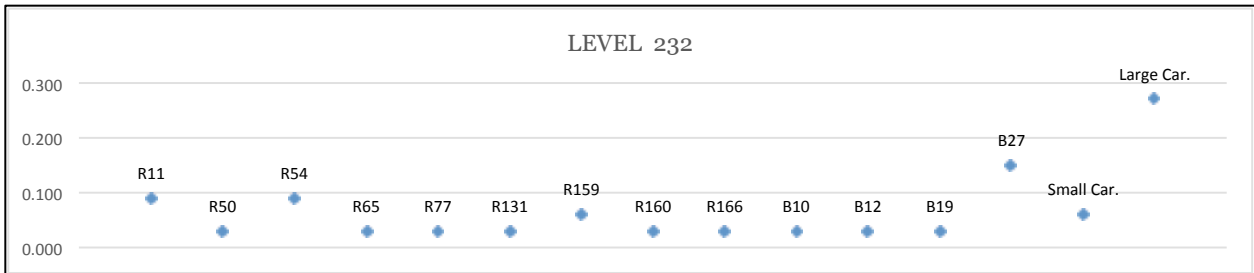

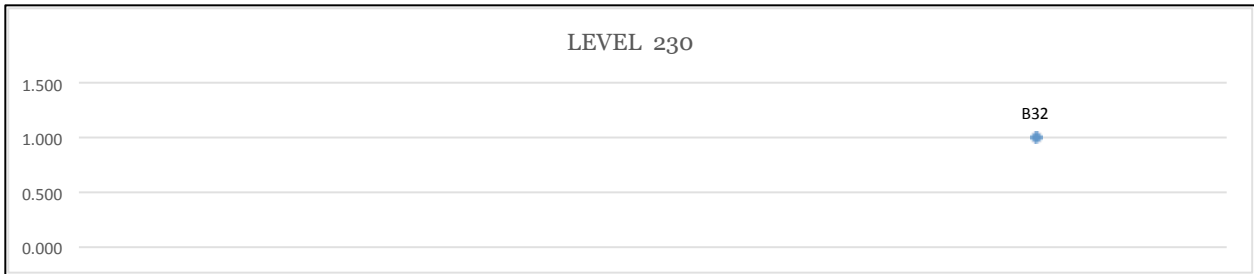

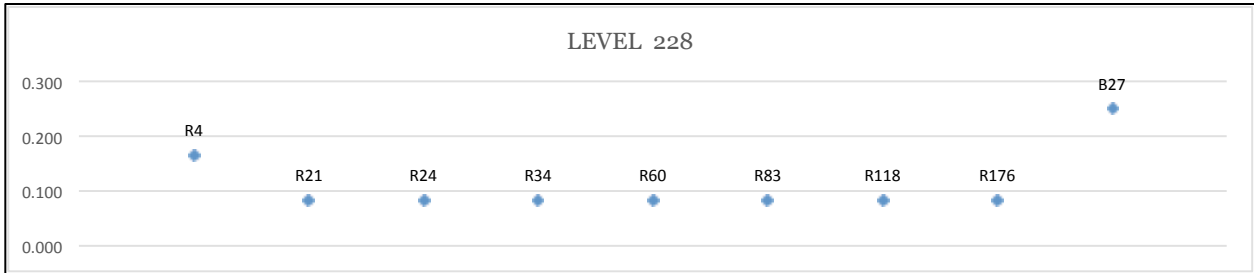

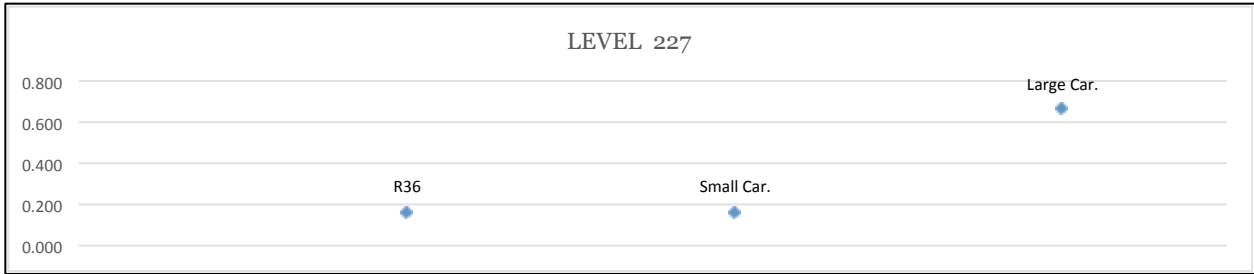

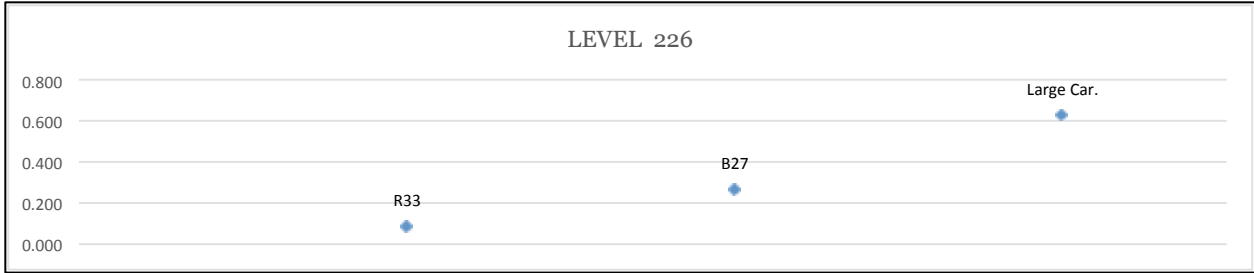

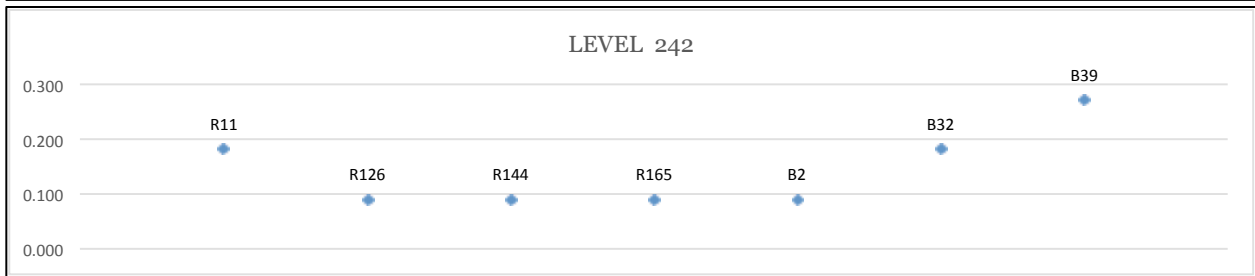

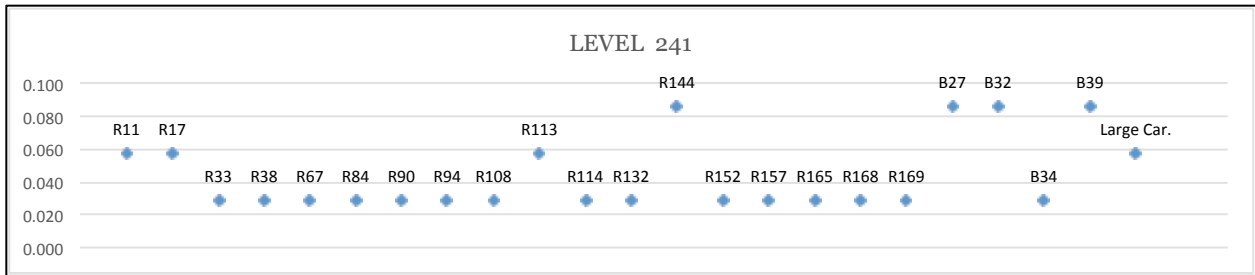

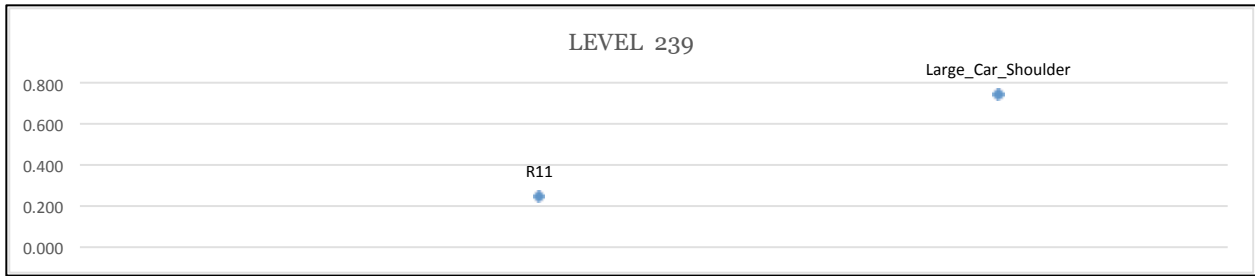

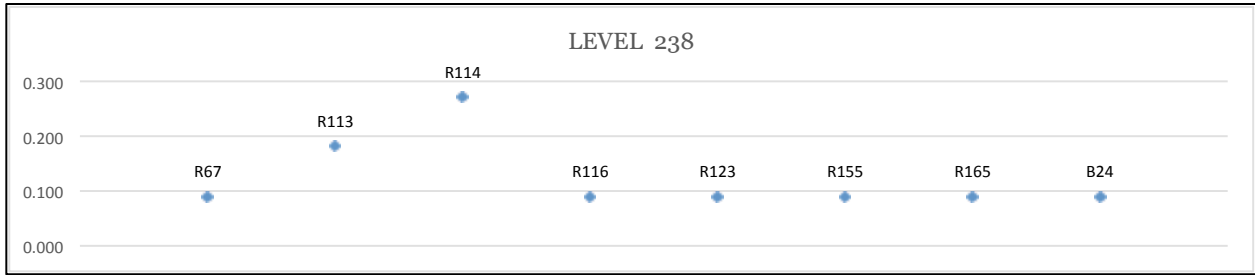

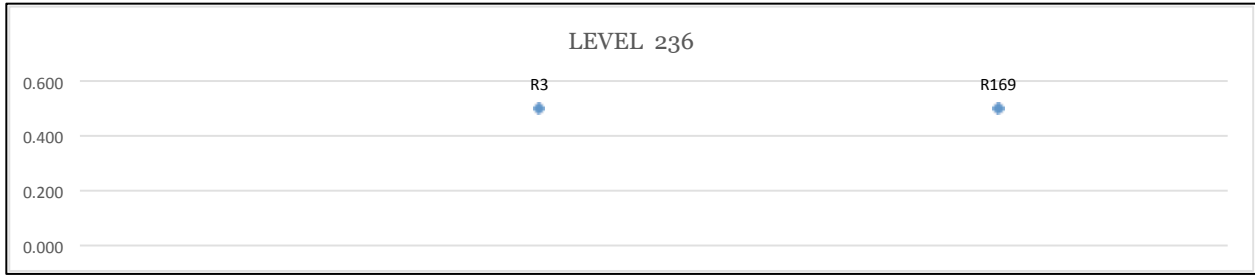

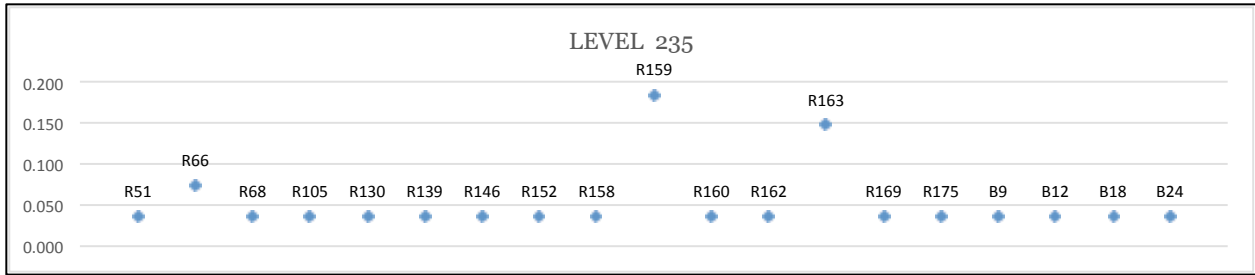

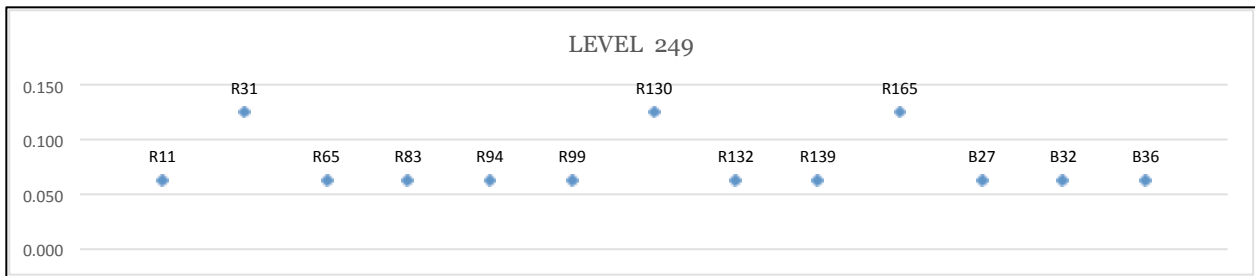

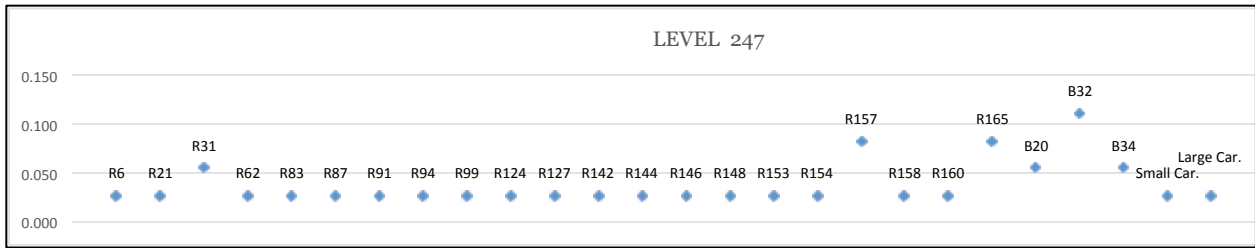

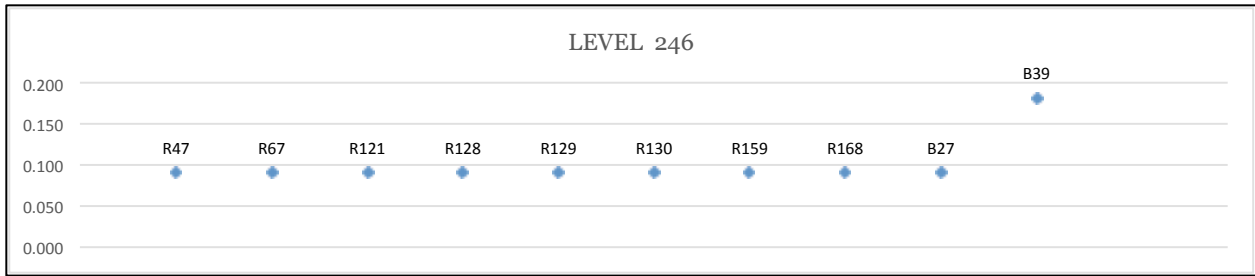

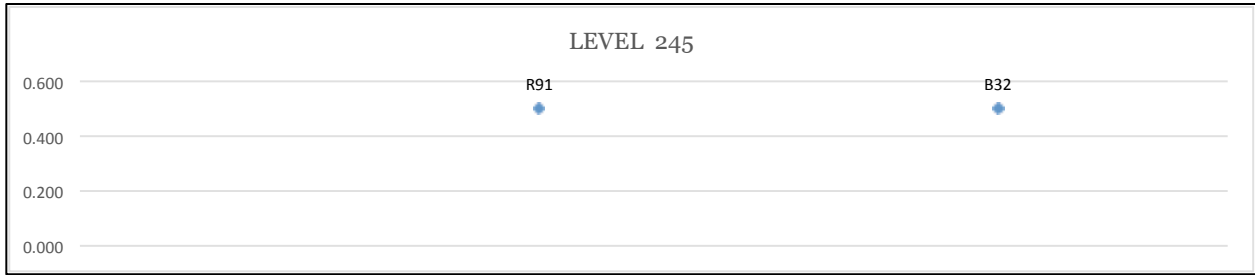

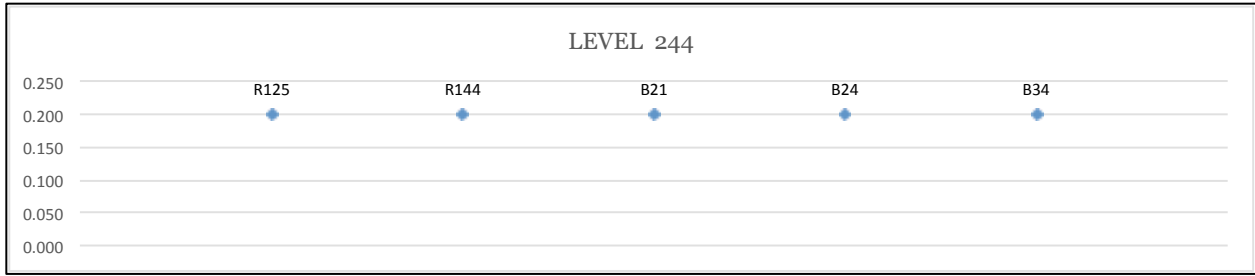

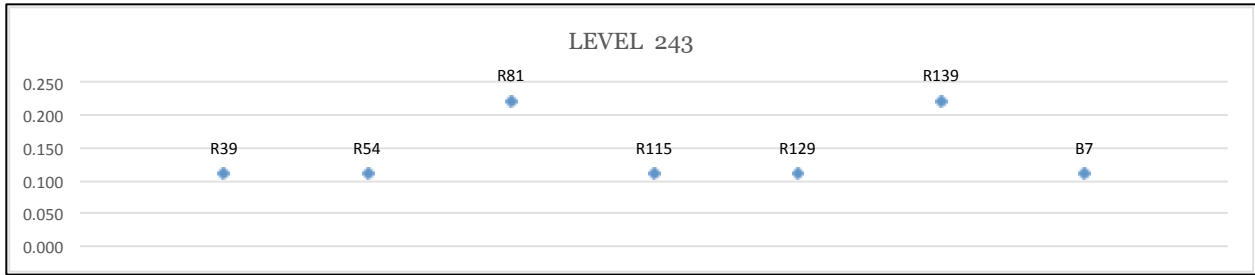

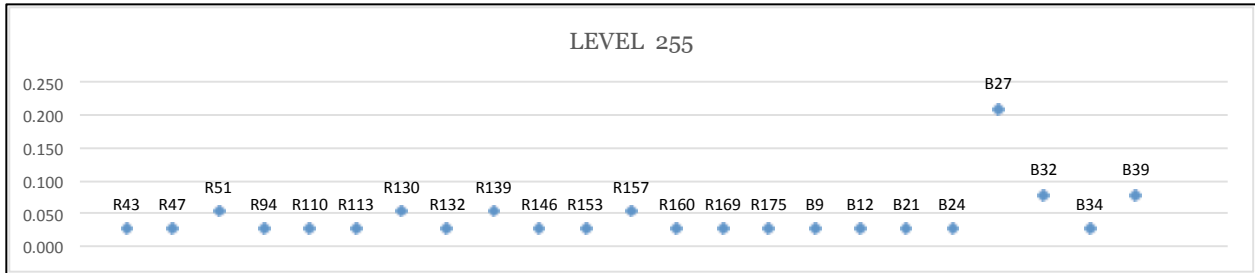

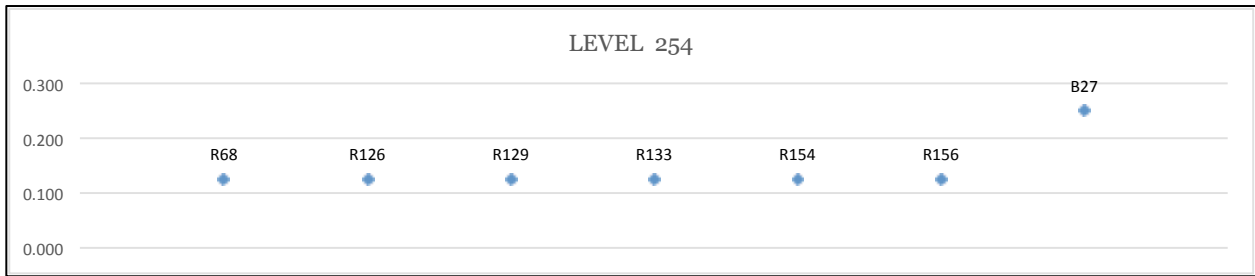

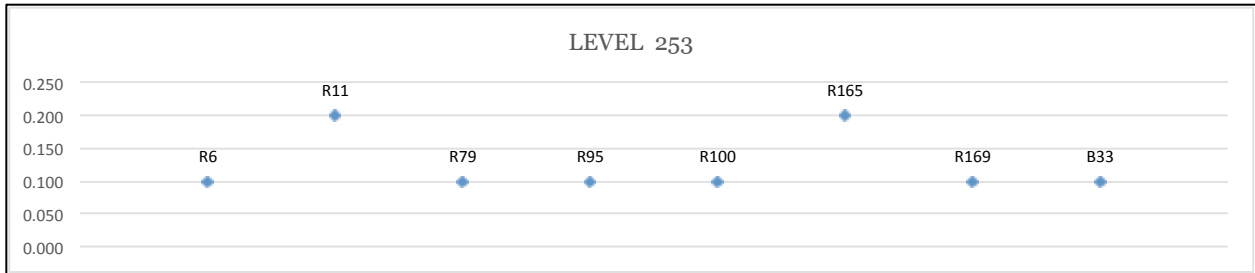

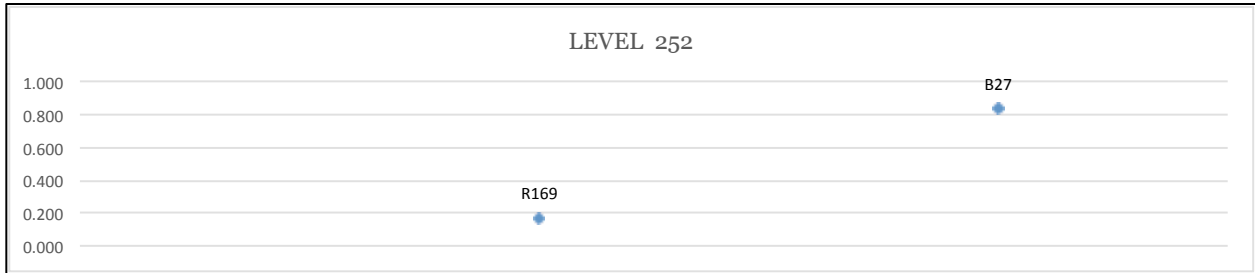

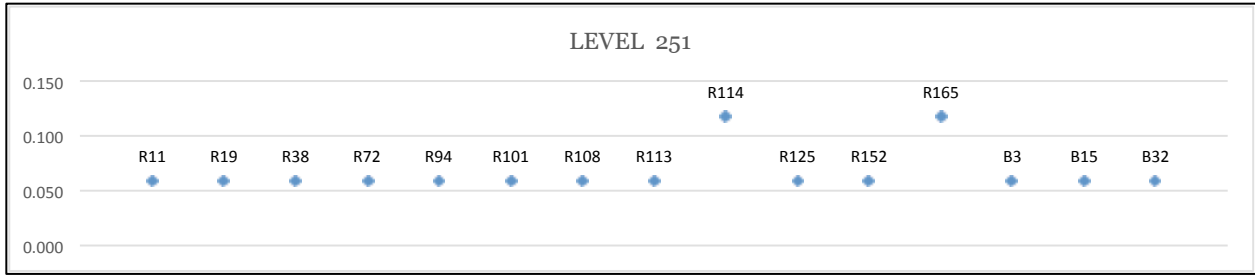

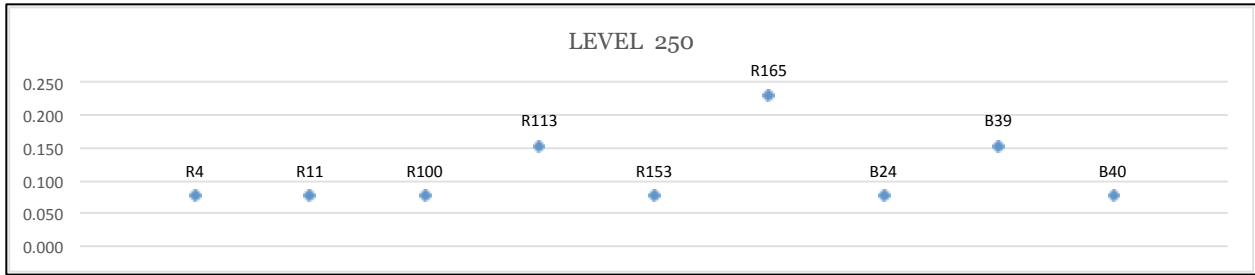

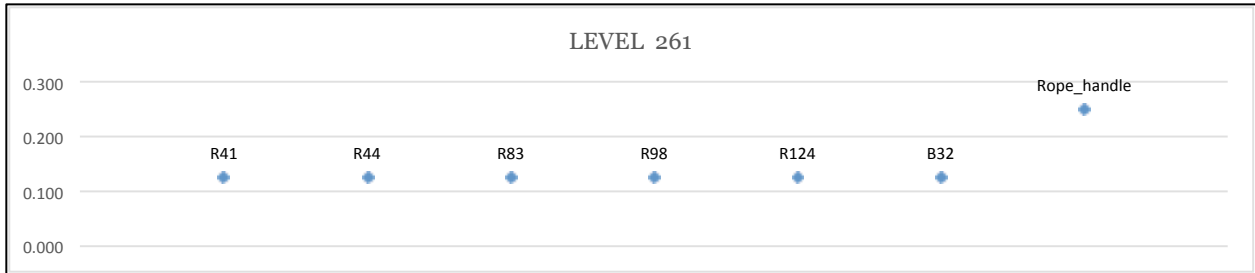

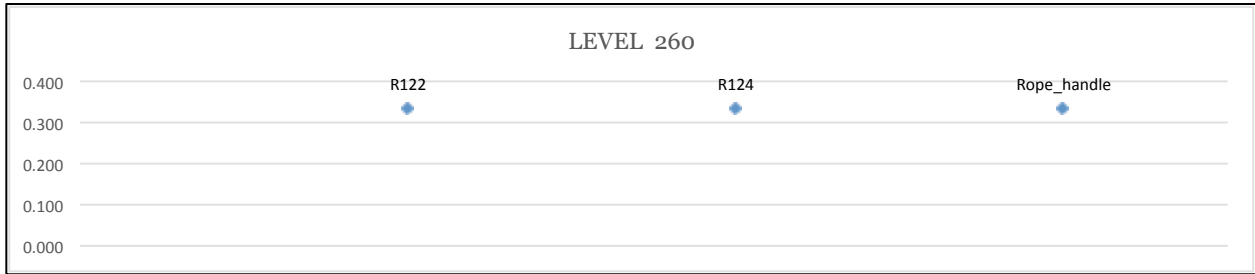

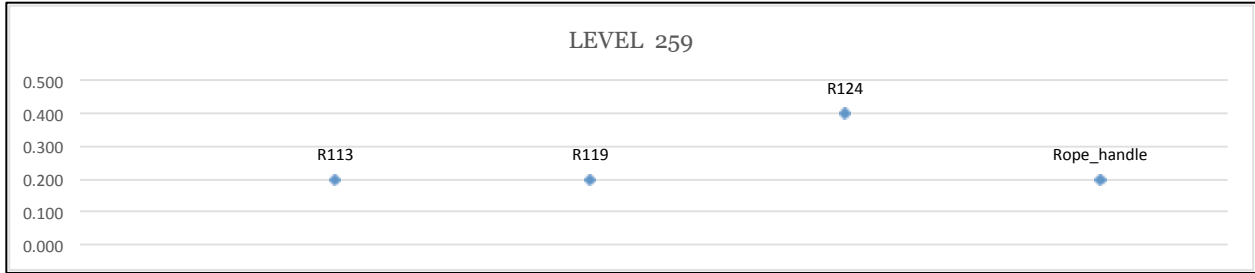

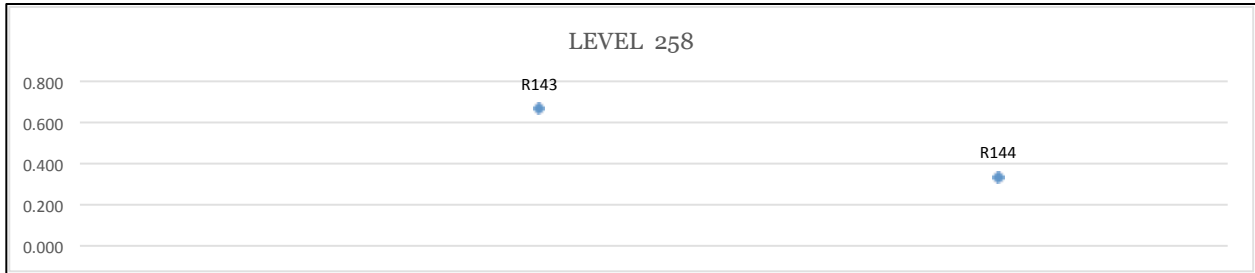

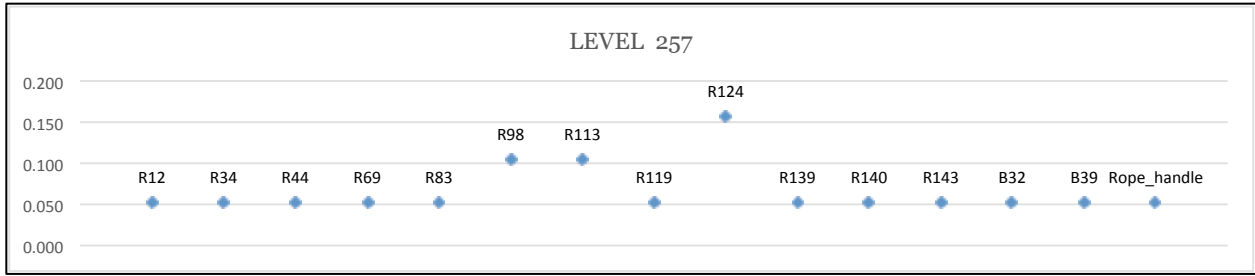

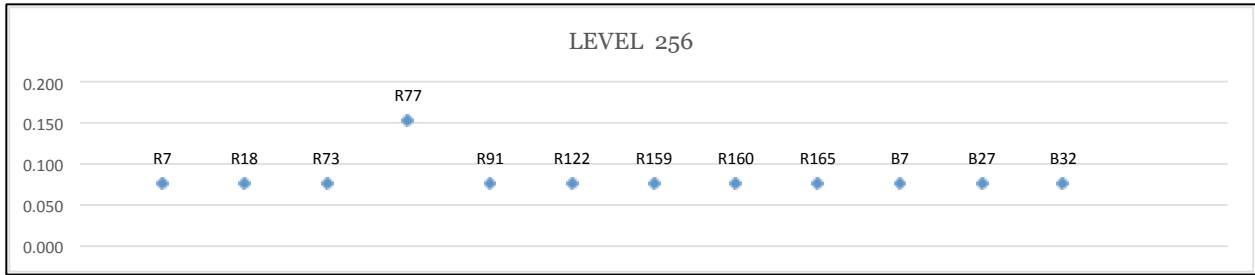

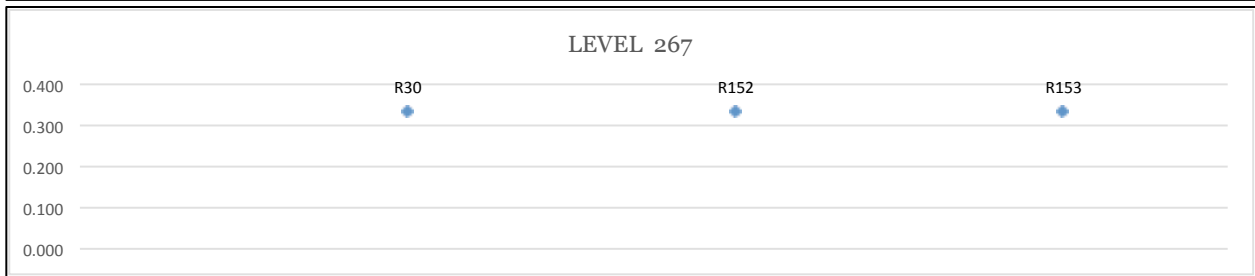

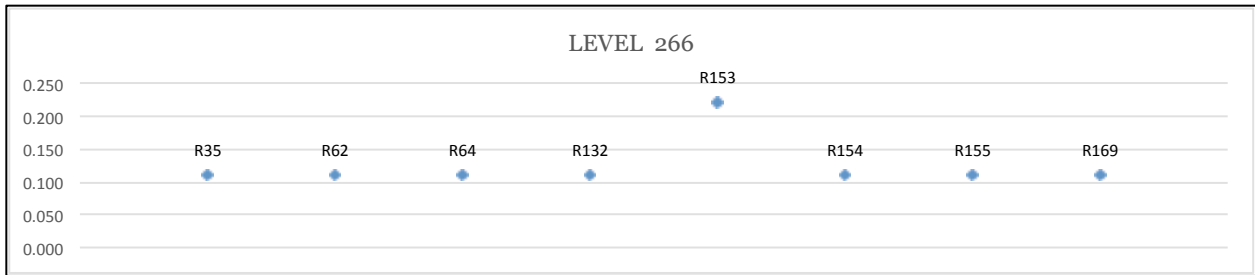

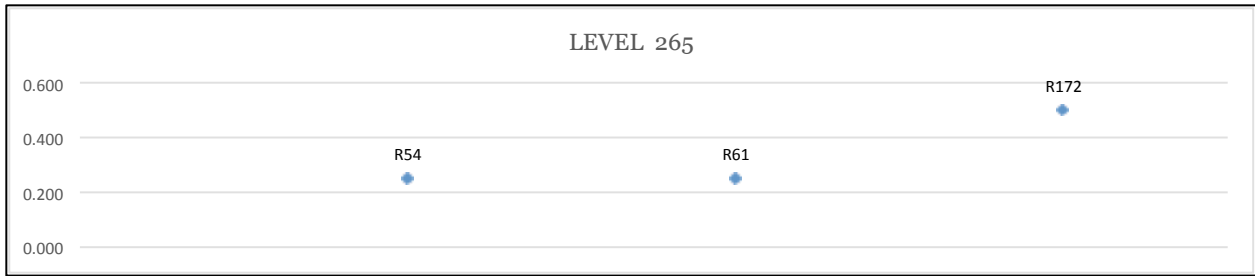

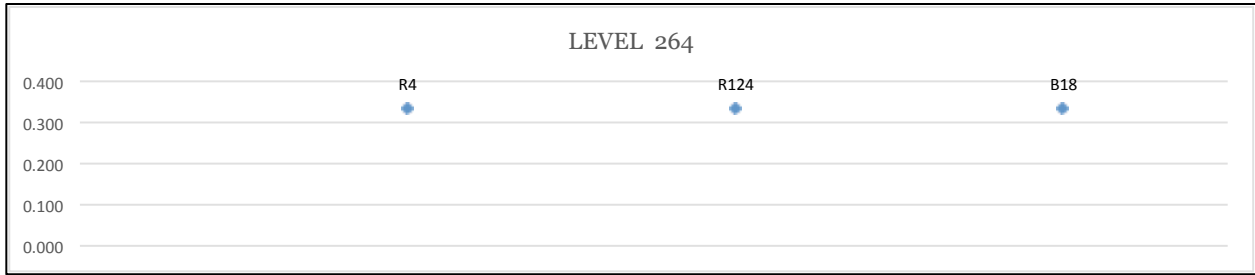

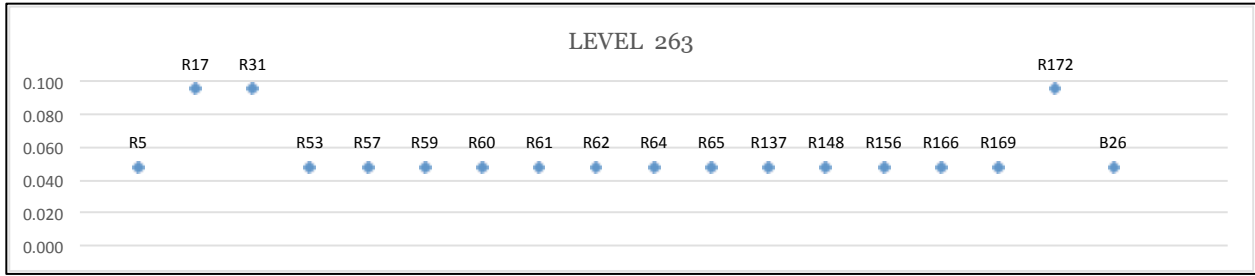

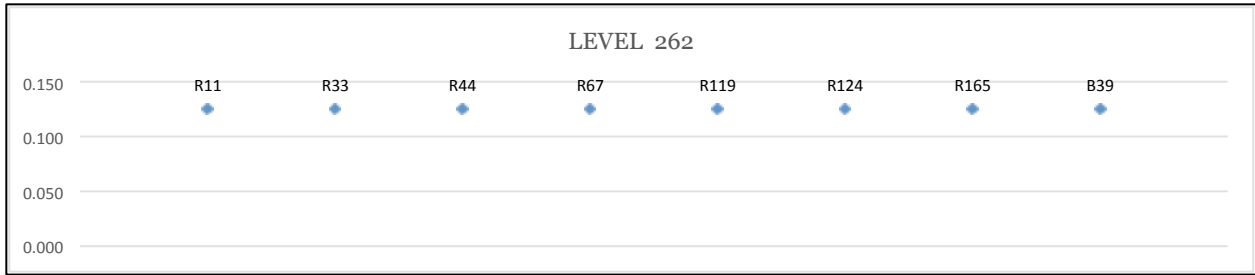

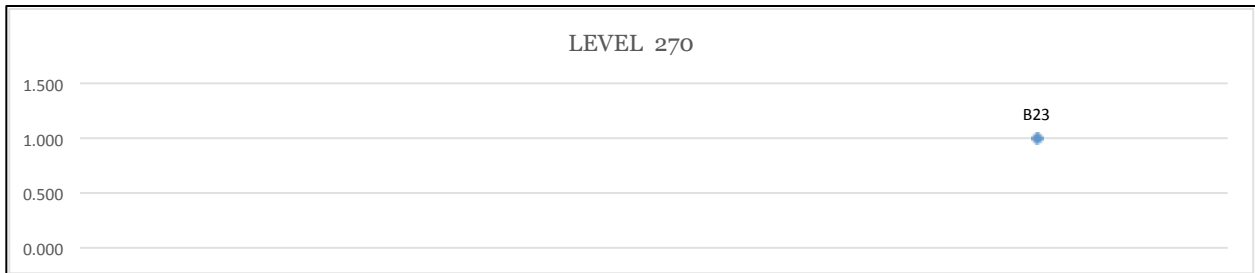

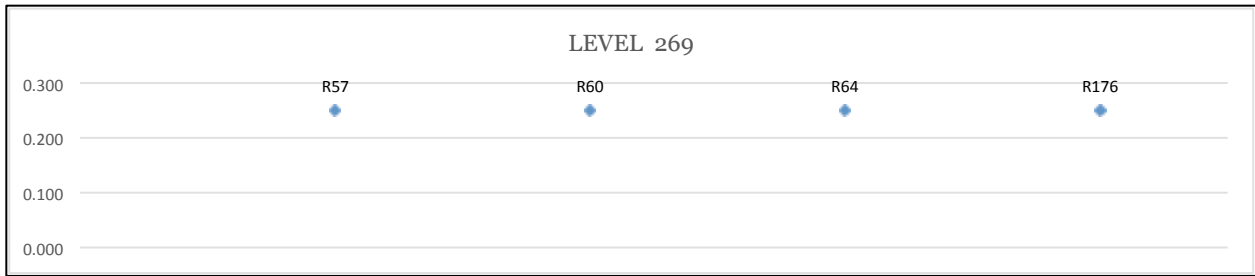

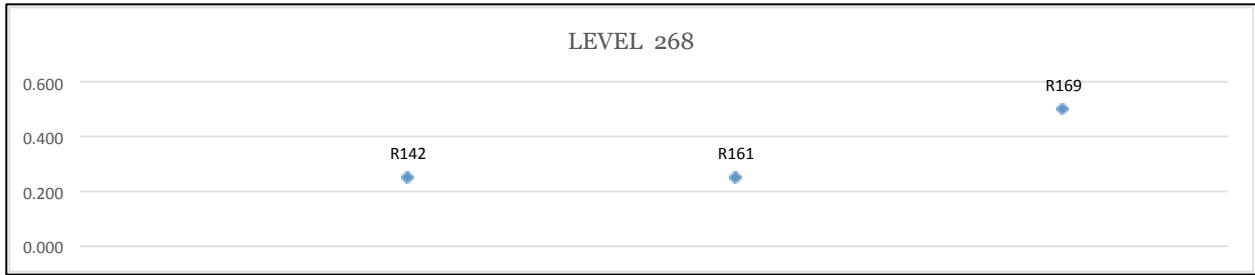

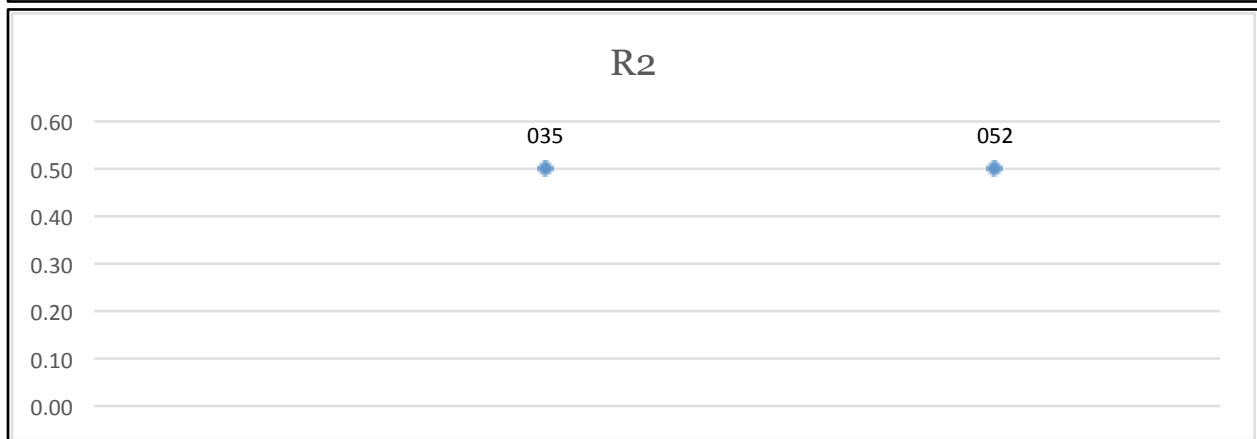

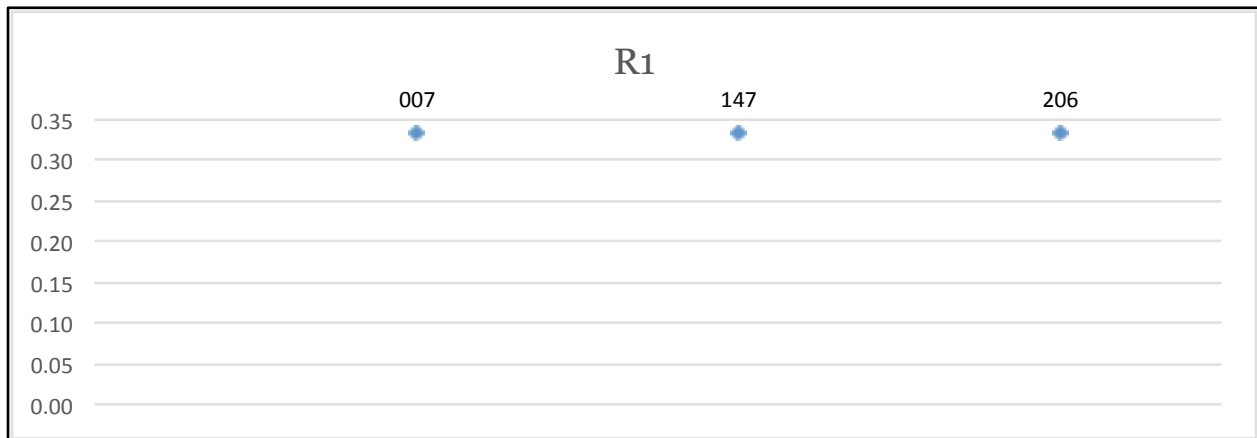

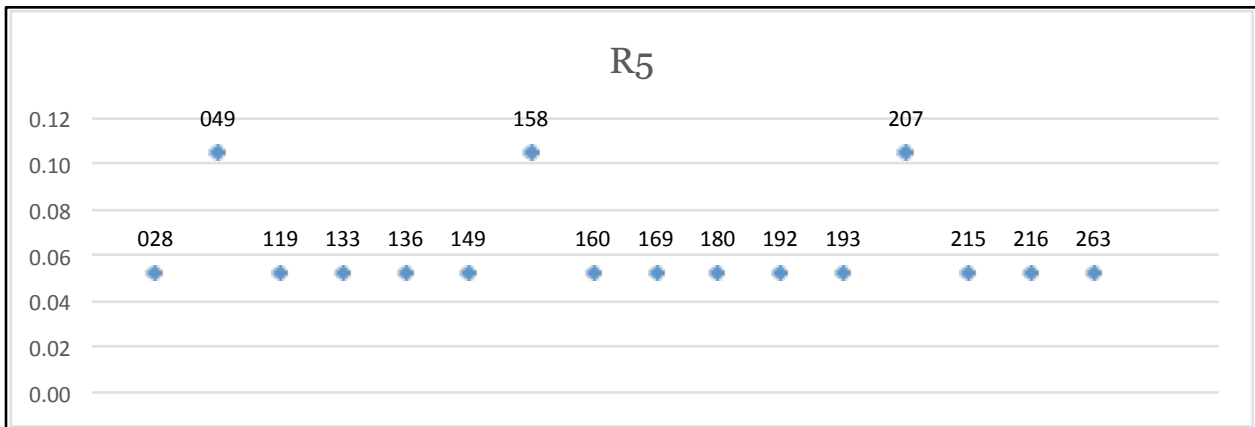

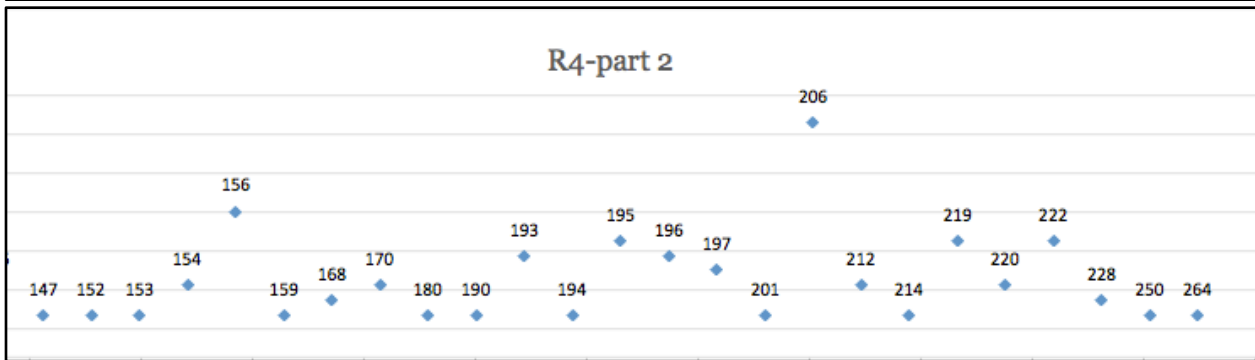

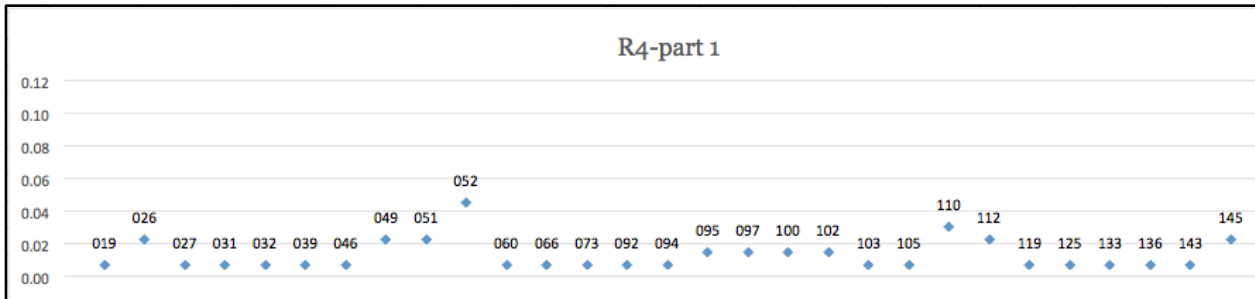

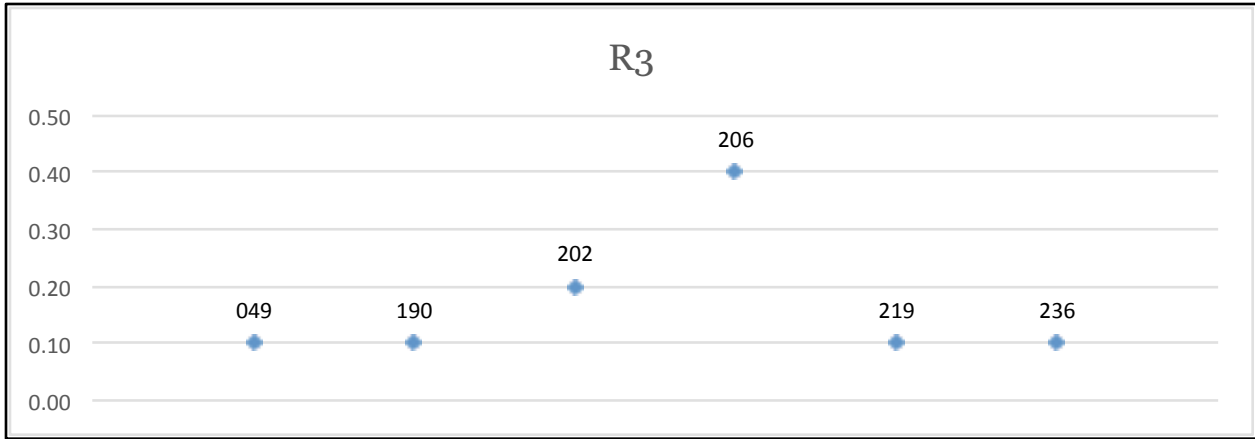

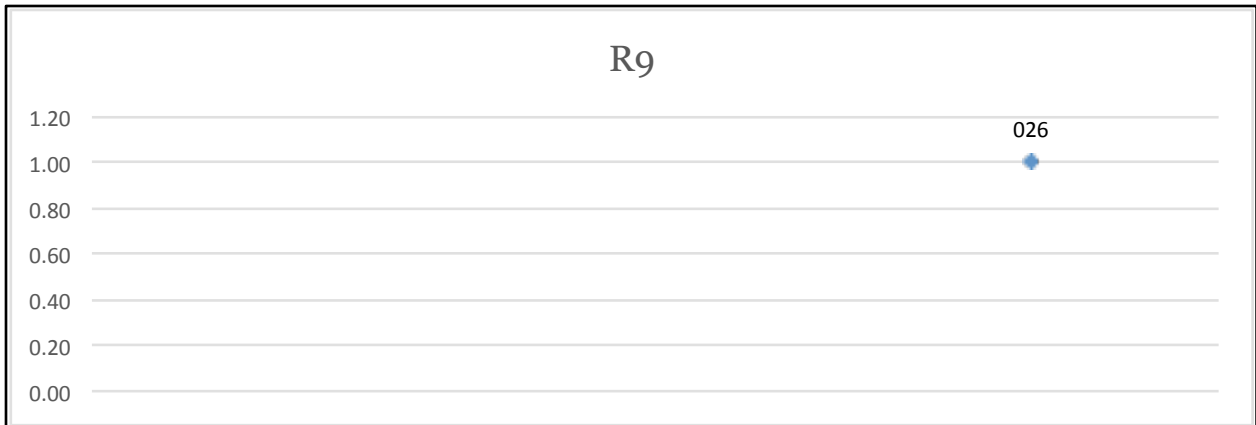

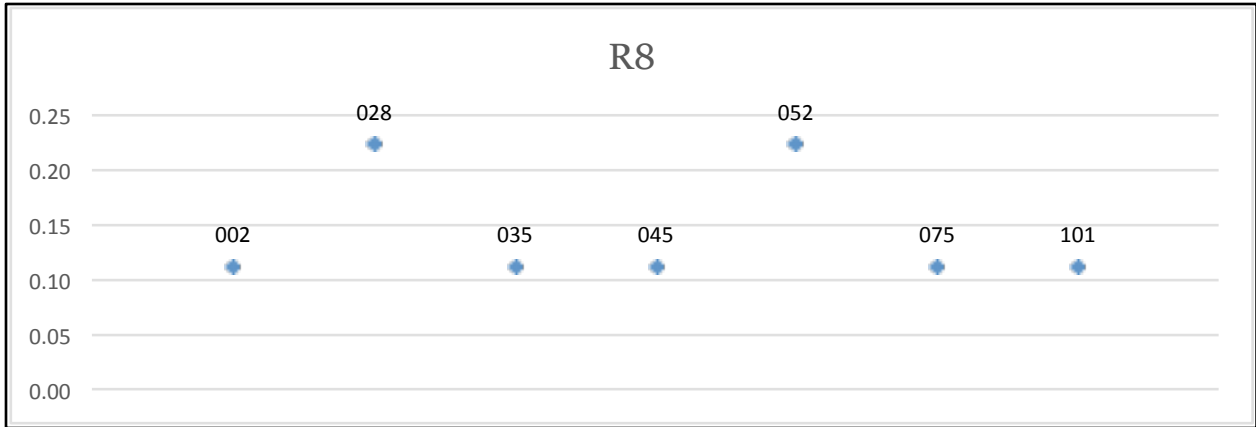

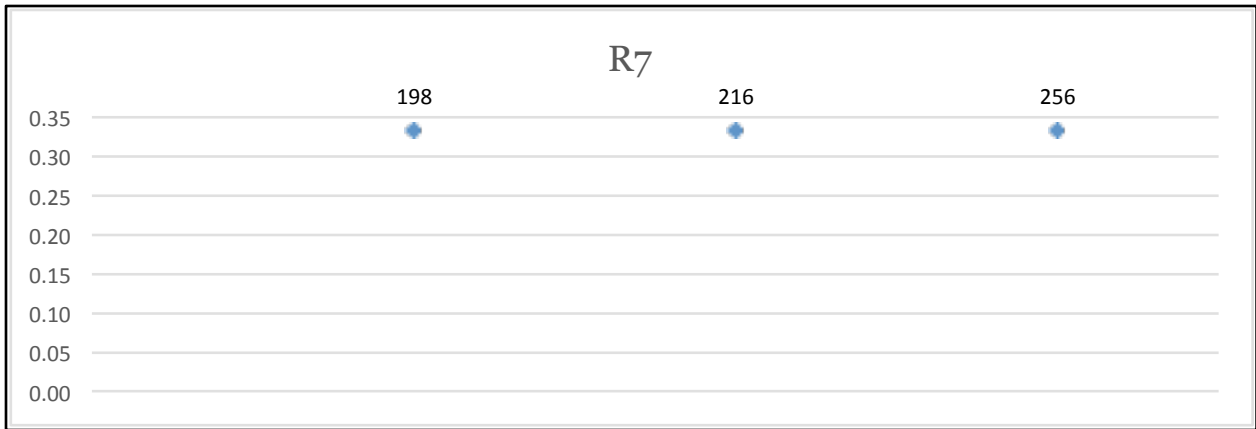

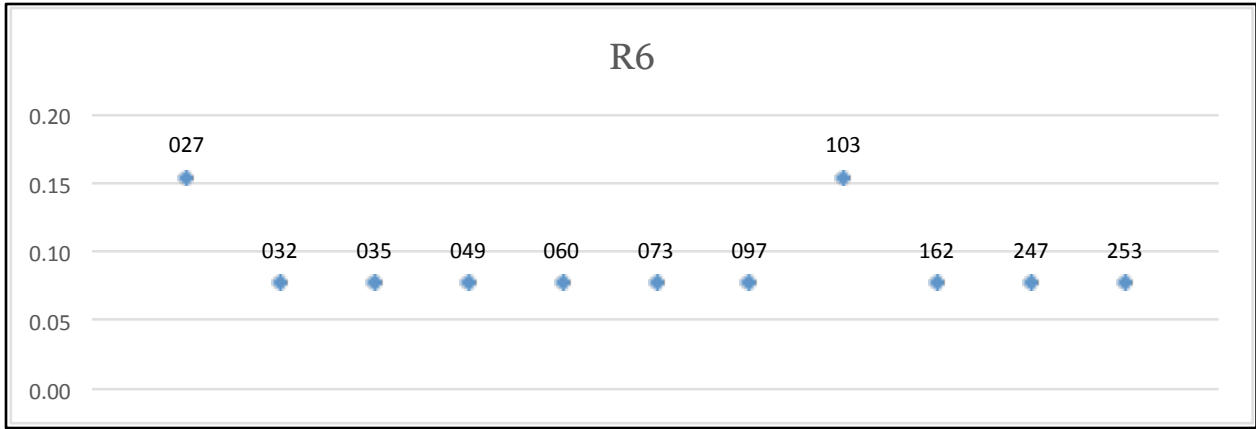

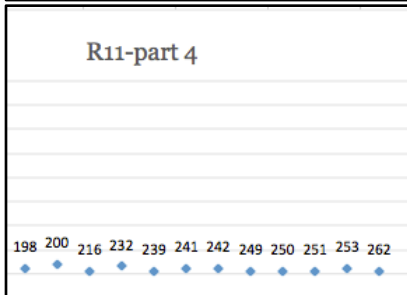

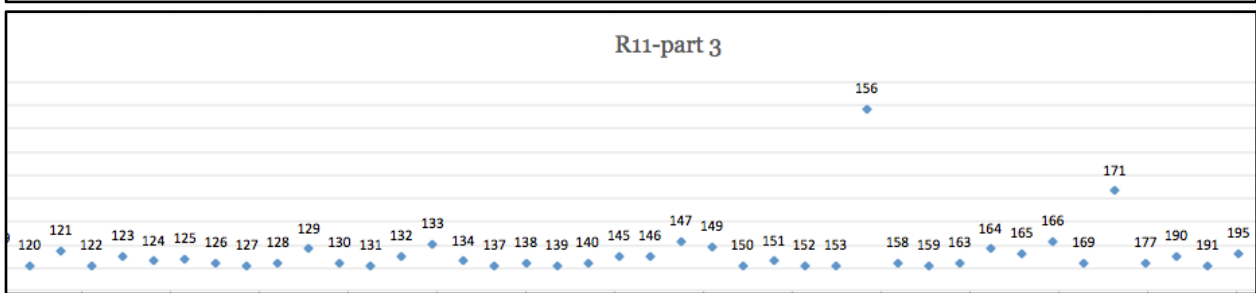

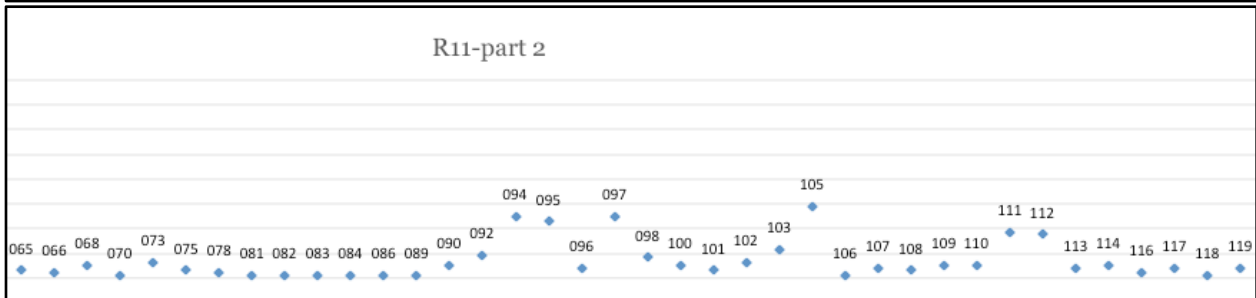

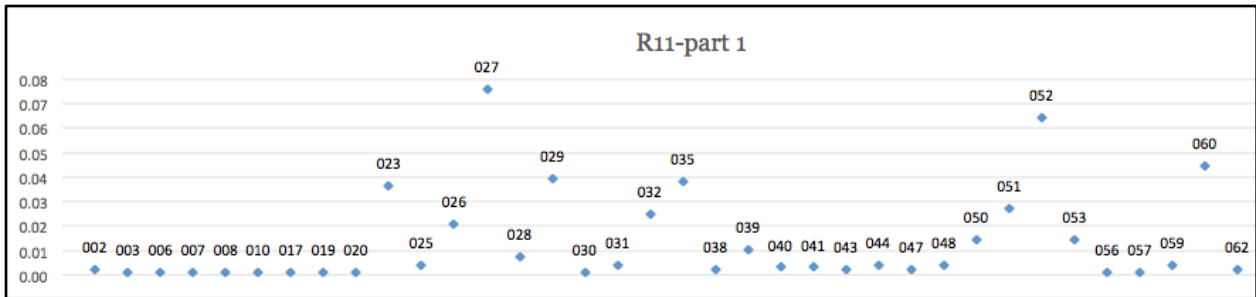

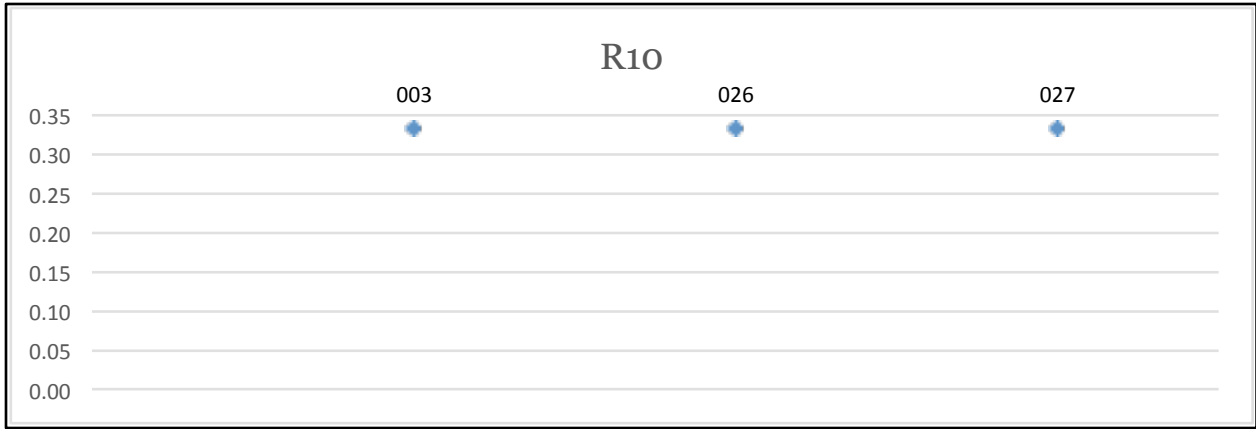

APPENDIX D
TYPES BY LEVEL

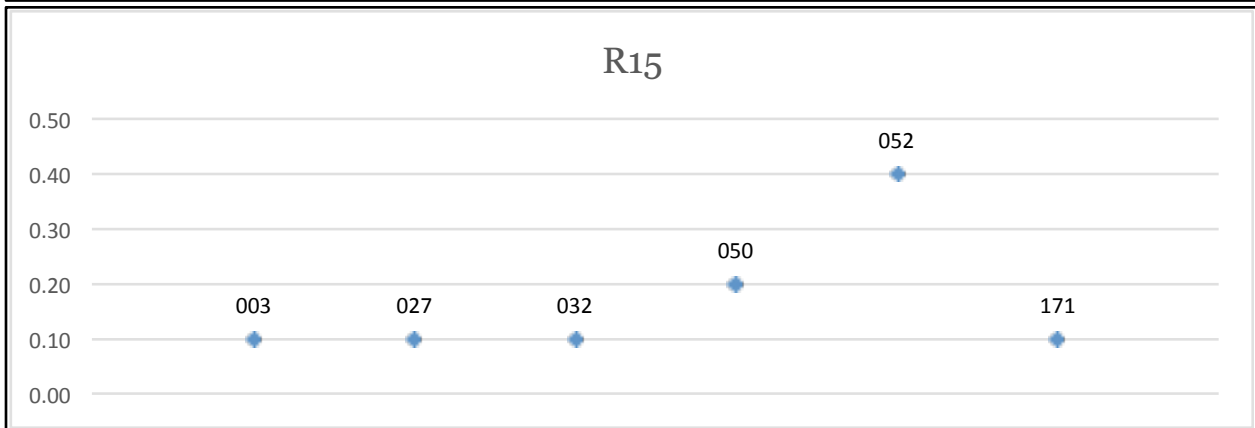

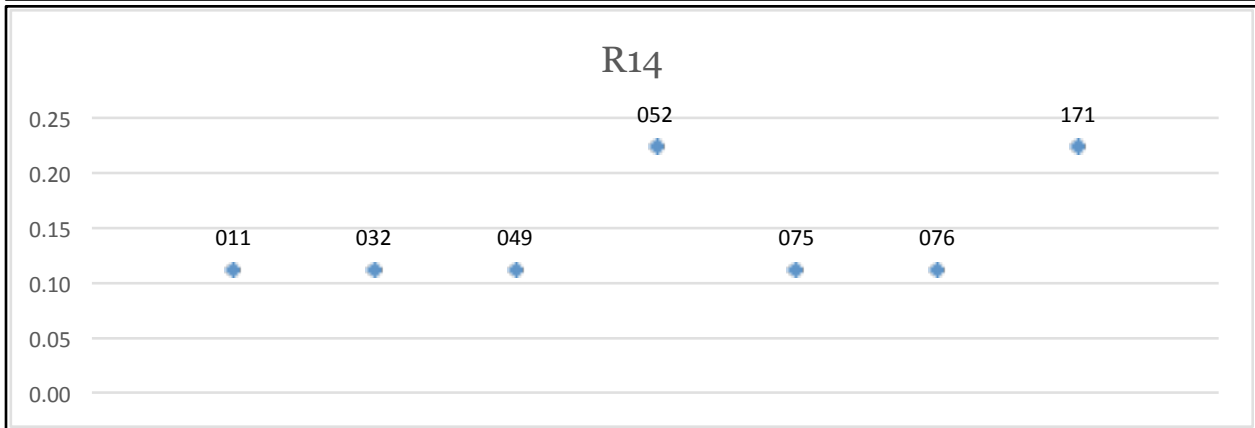

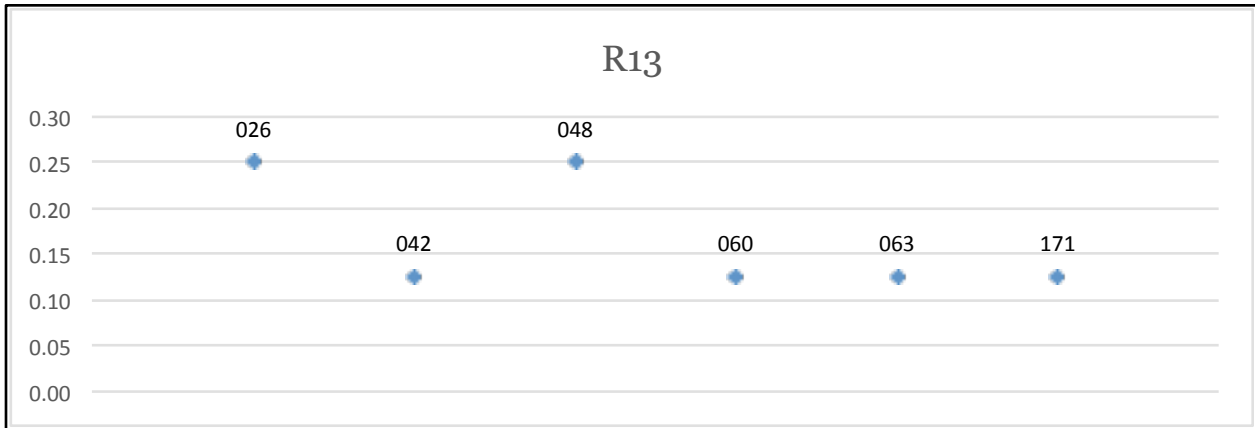

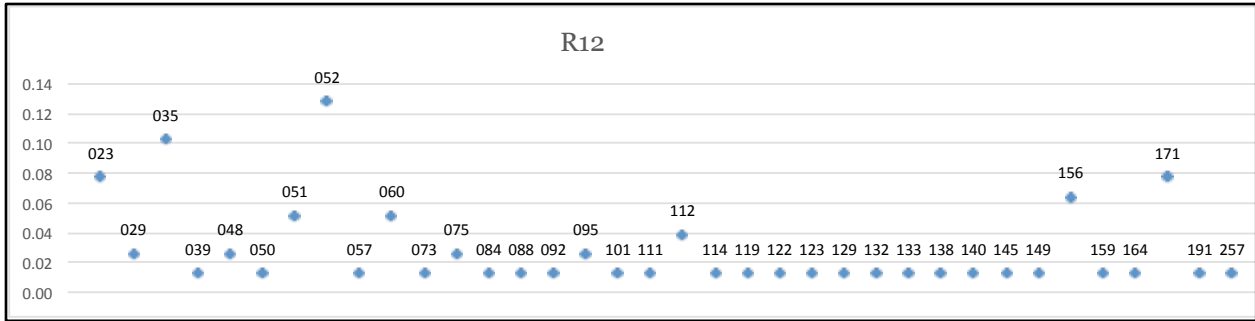

This appendix provides a graph of each shape type's distribution among the stratified deposits. The type number is given in the heading of the graph and each stratified deposit, or level, in which the type was found is represented by a dot along the horizontal axis. The vertical axis measures the percentage of the total number of that shape type's sherds in each level. For purposes of space, upper profile types are called "R," lower profile types are called "B," and stratified deposits, or levels, are called "L."

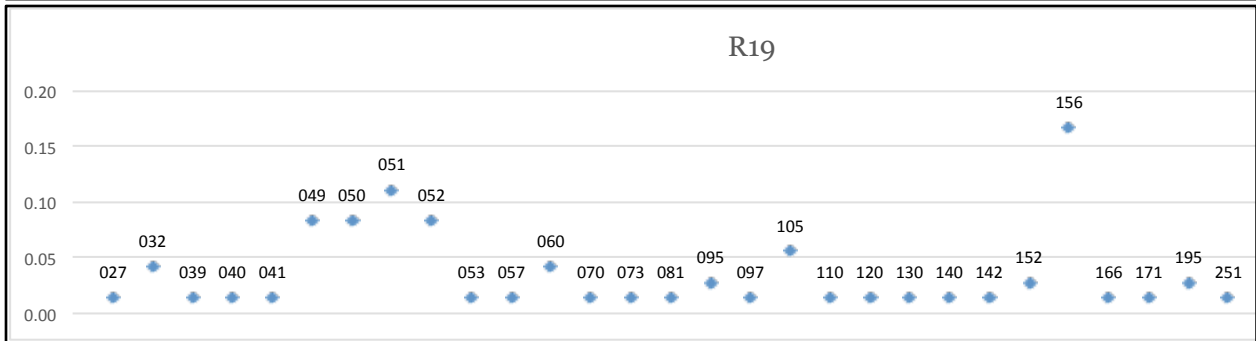

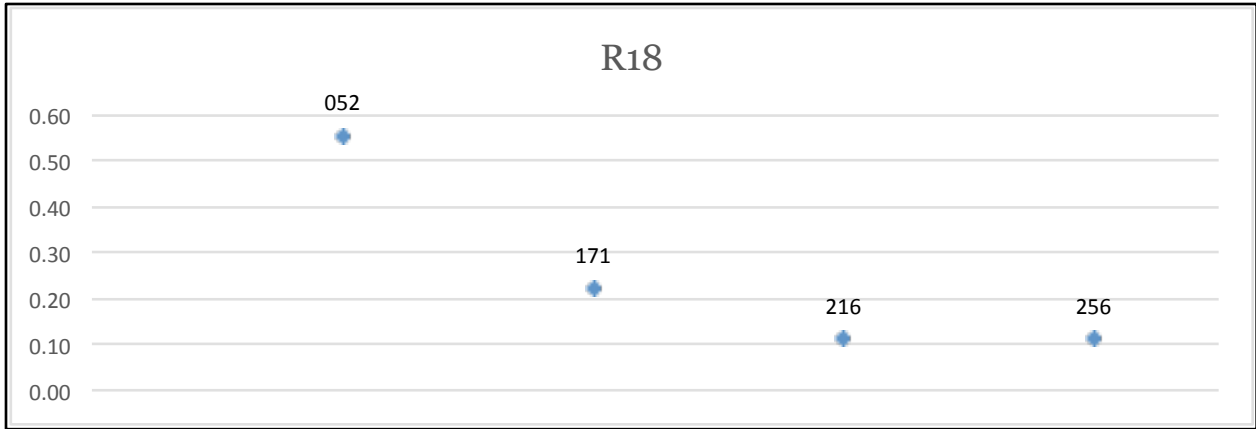

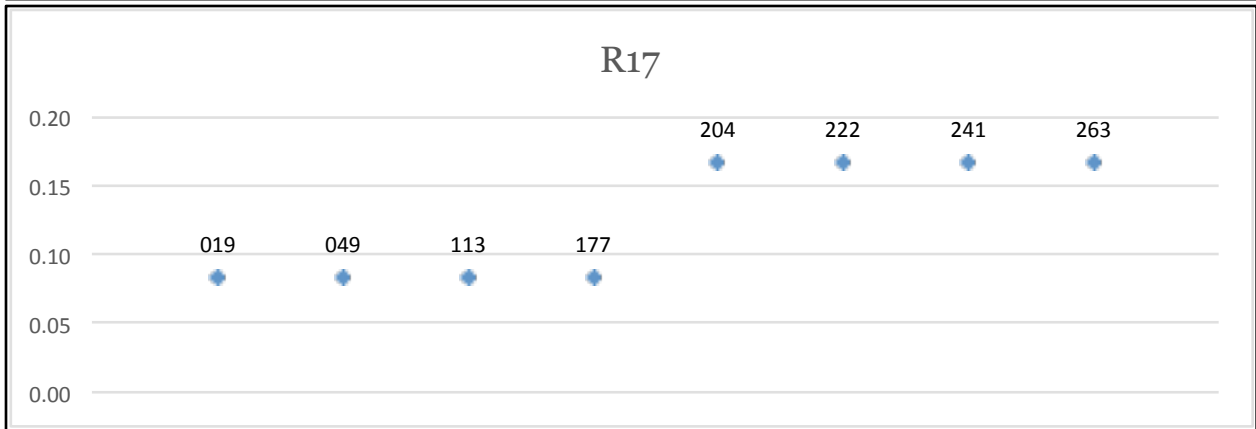

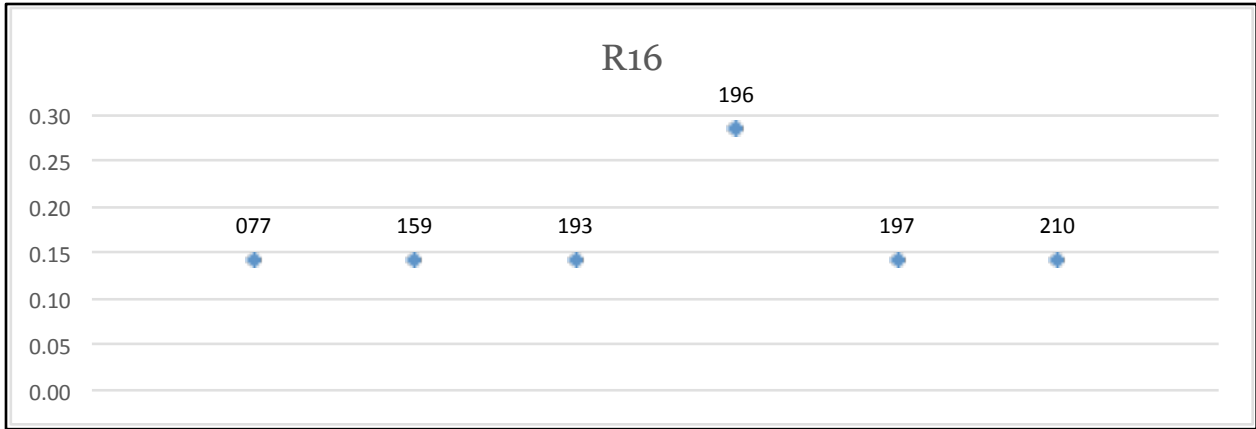

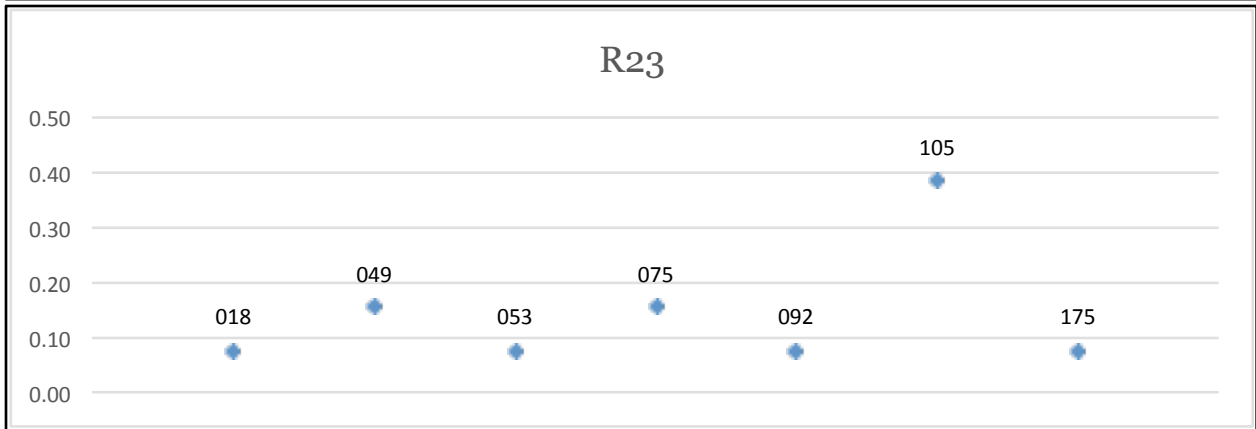

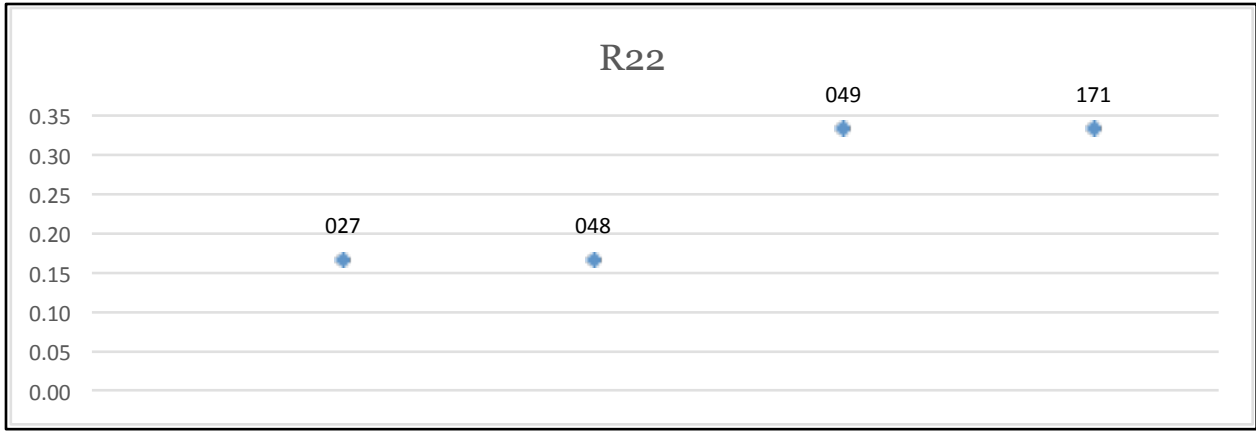

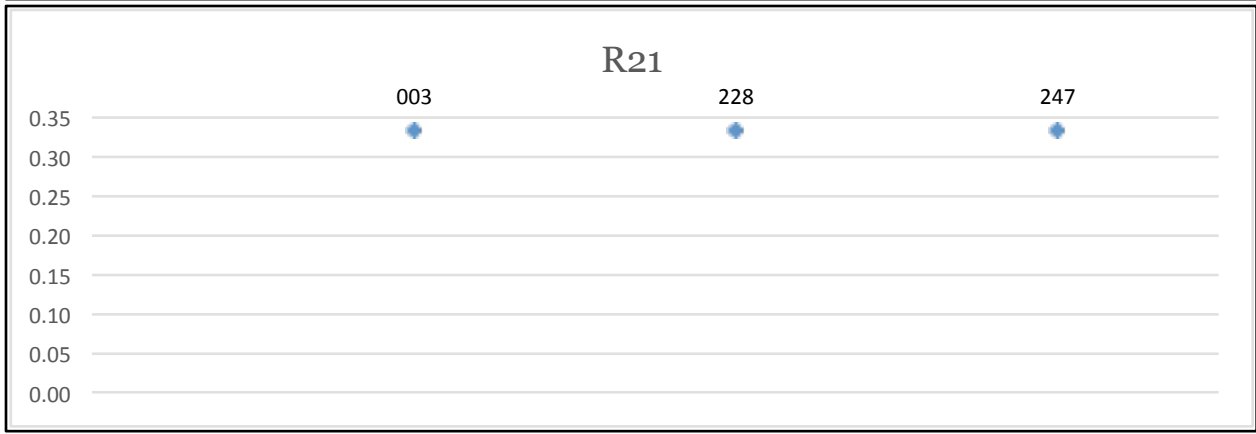

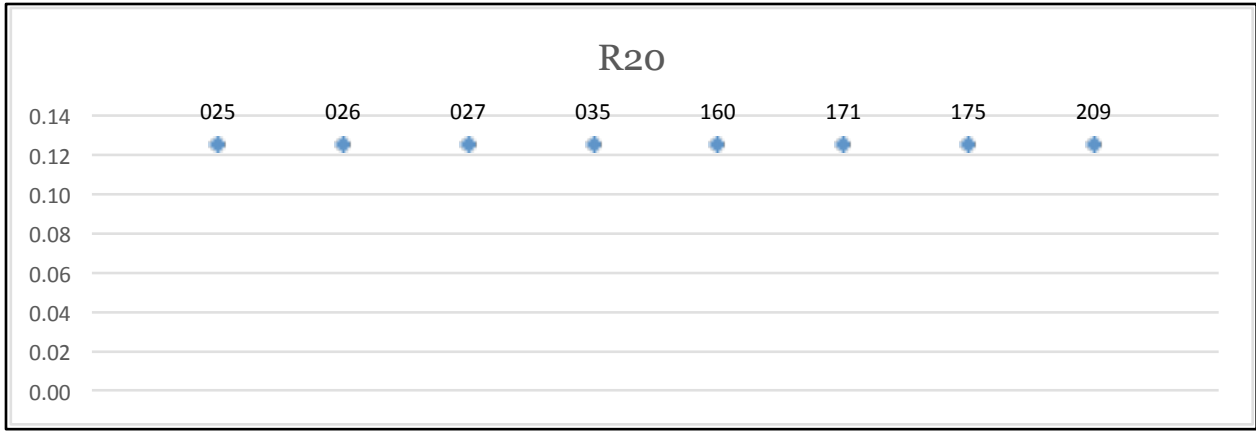

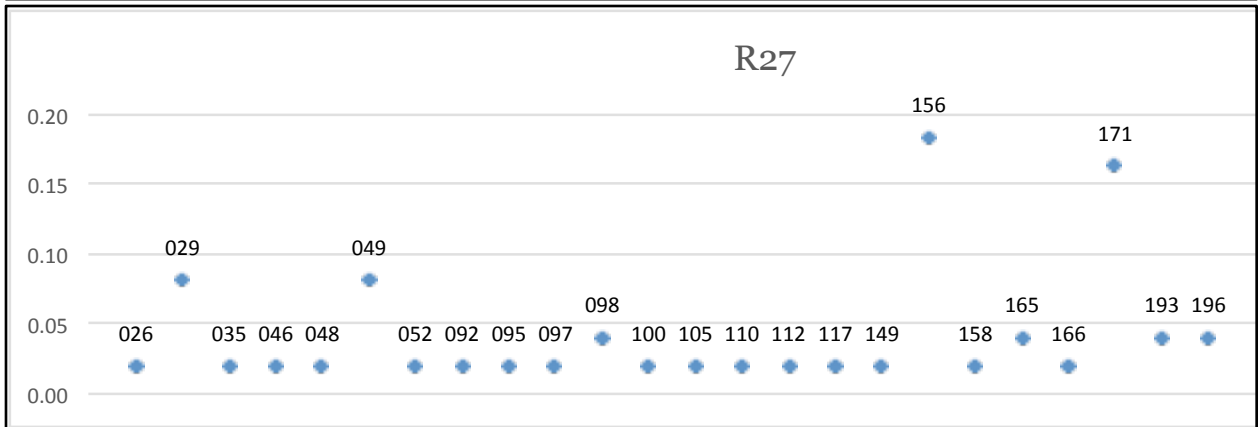

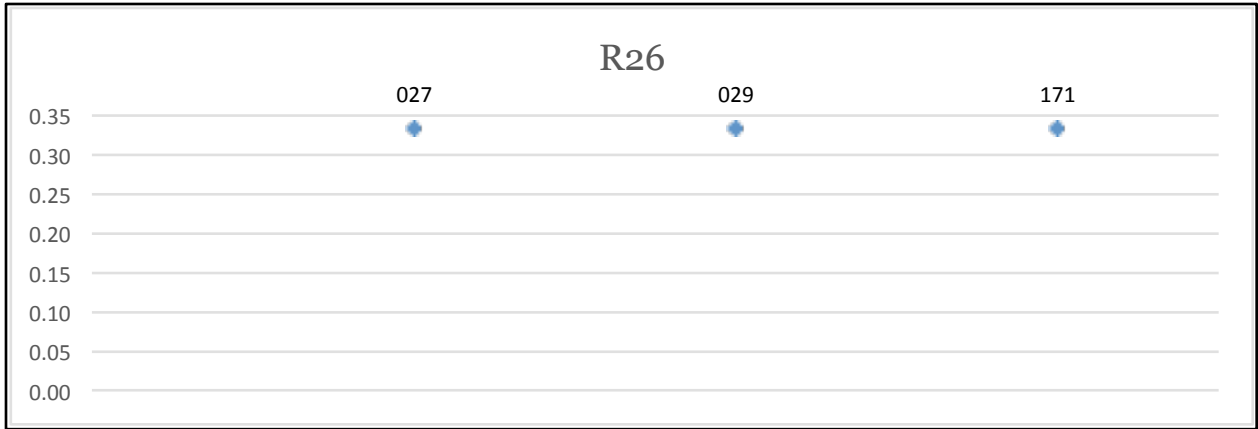

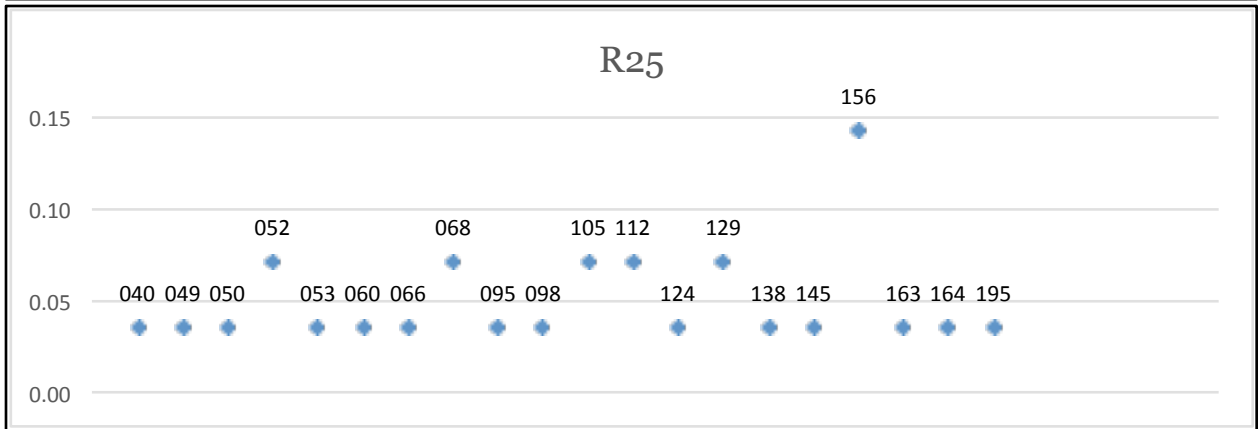

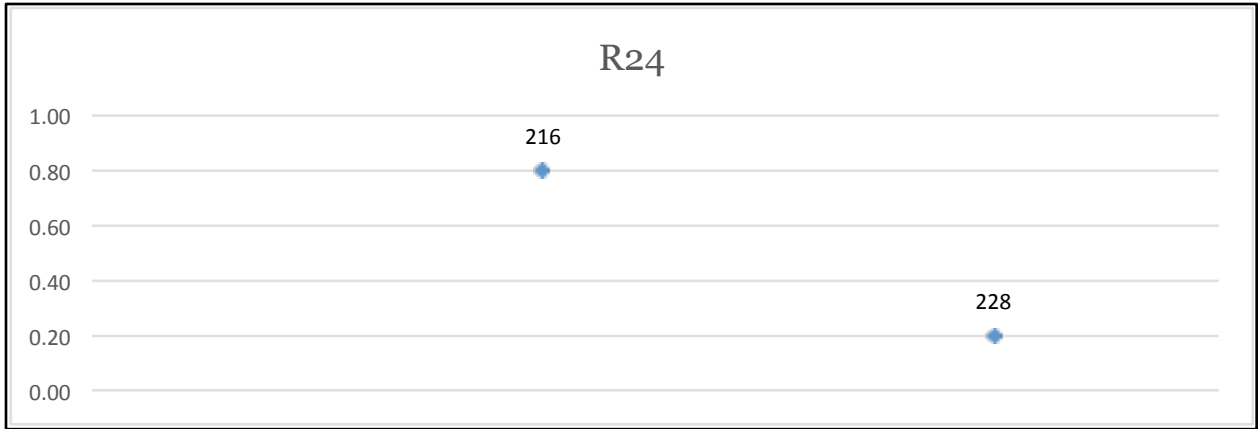

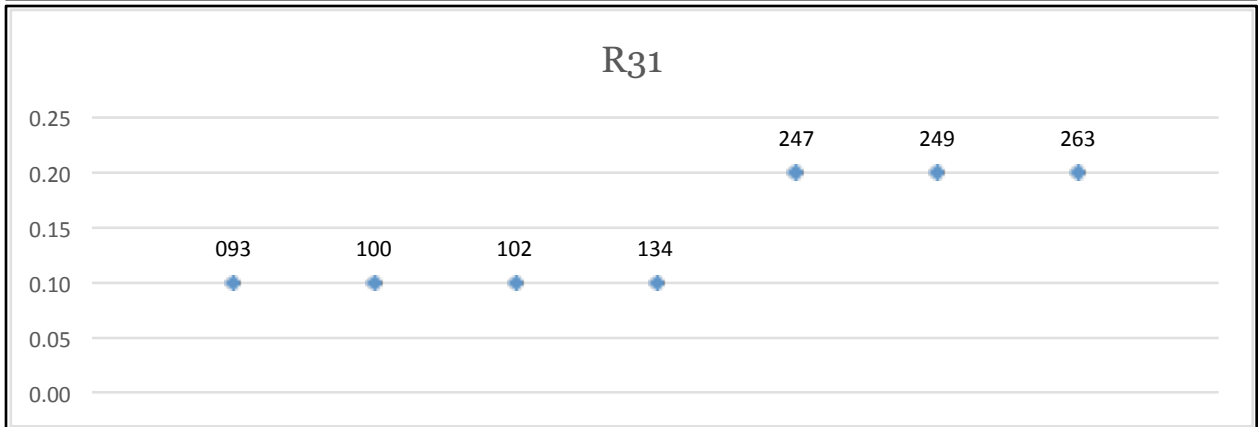

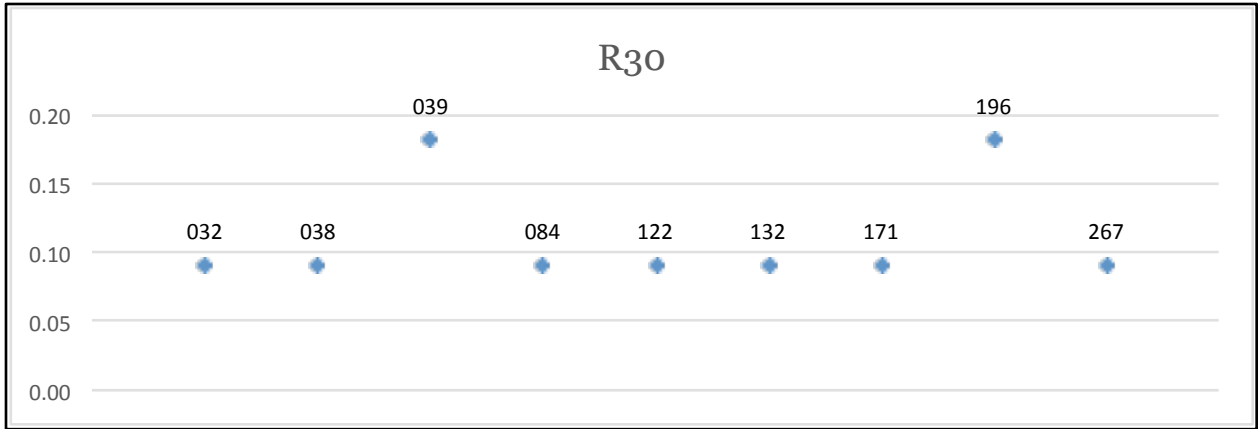

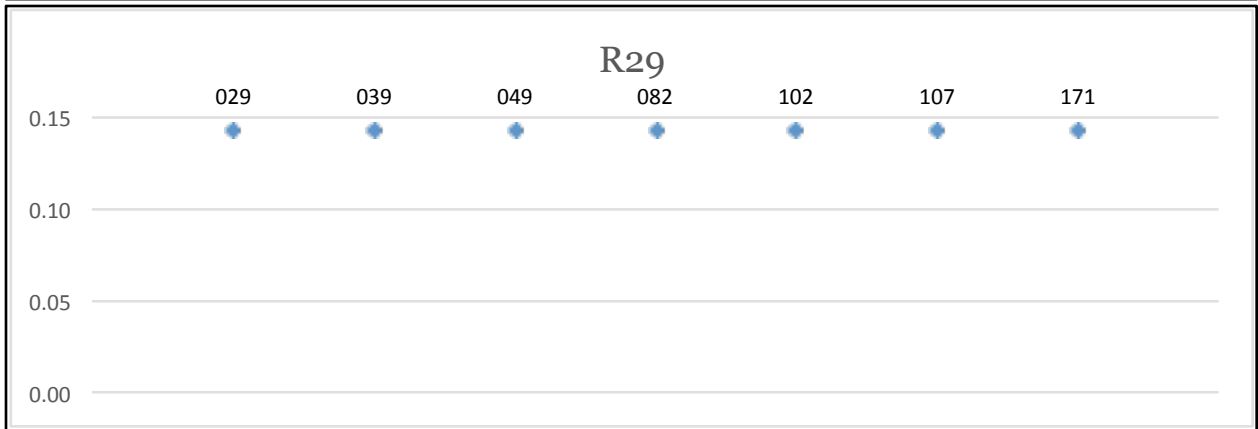

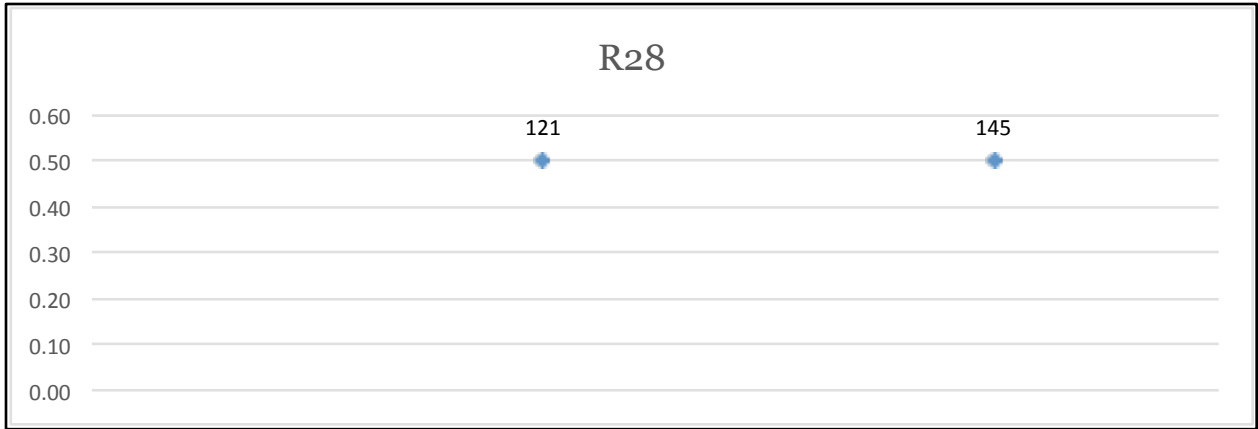

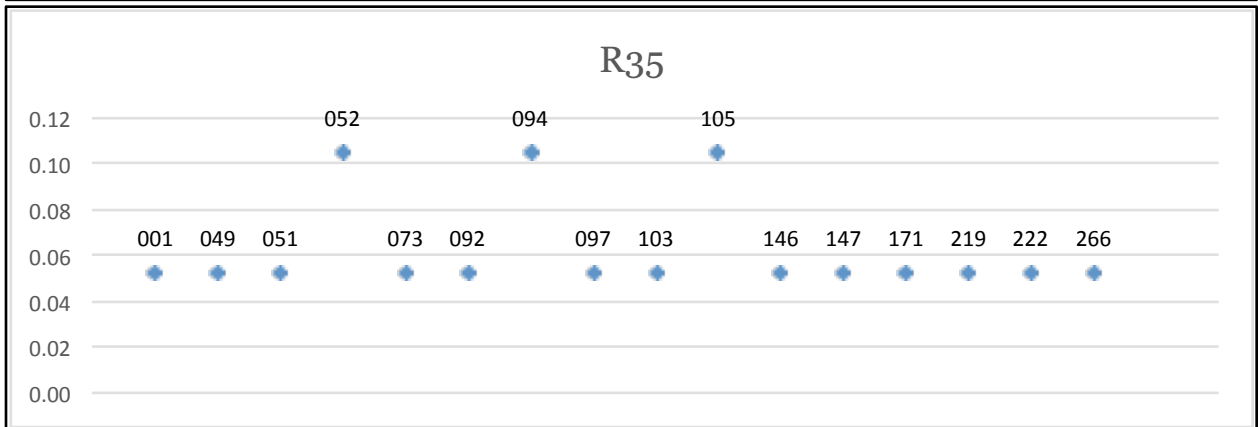

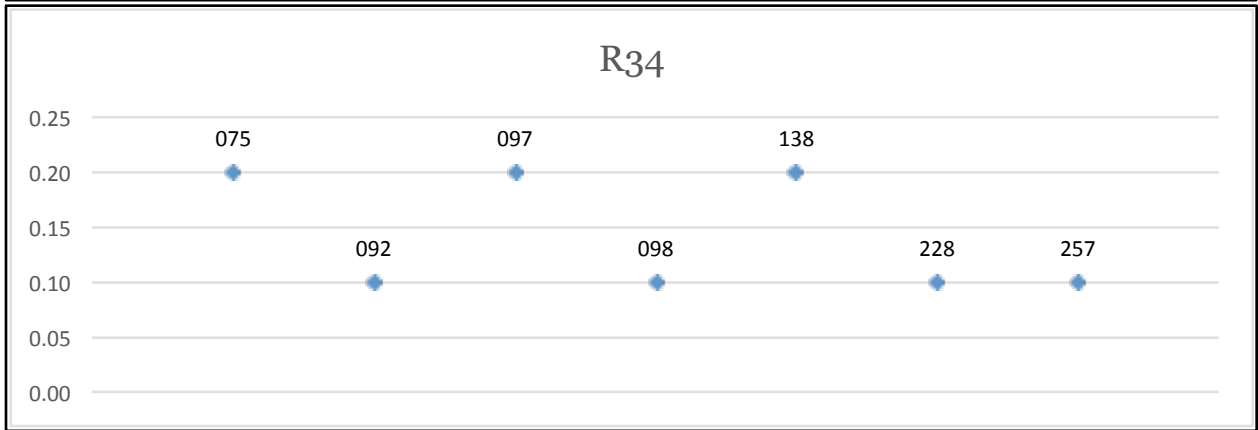

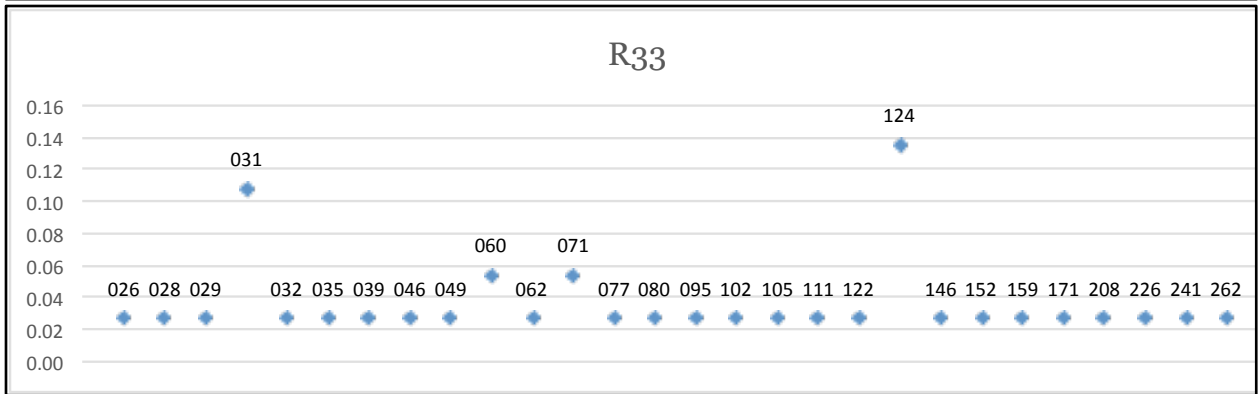

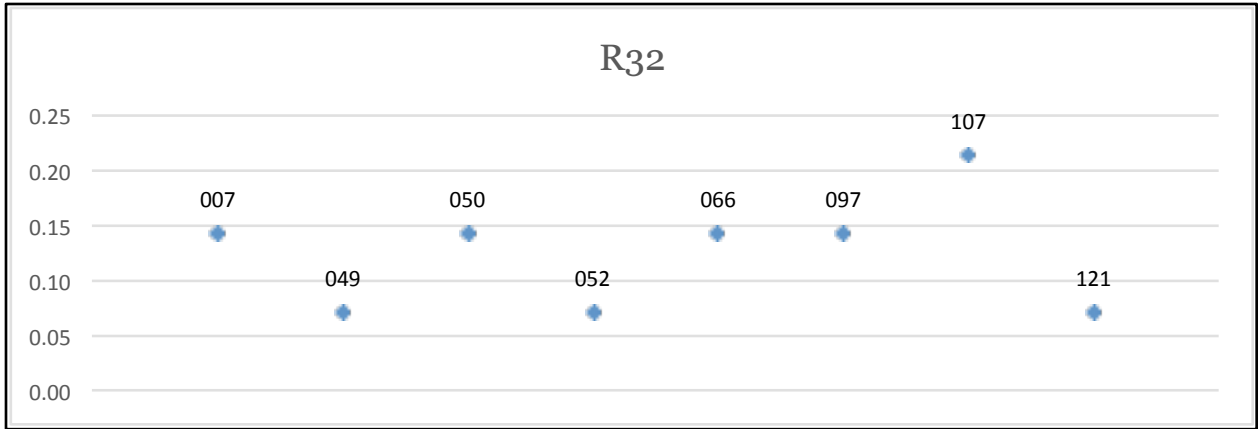

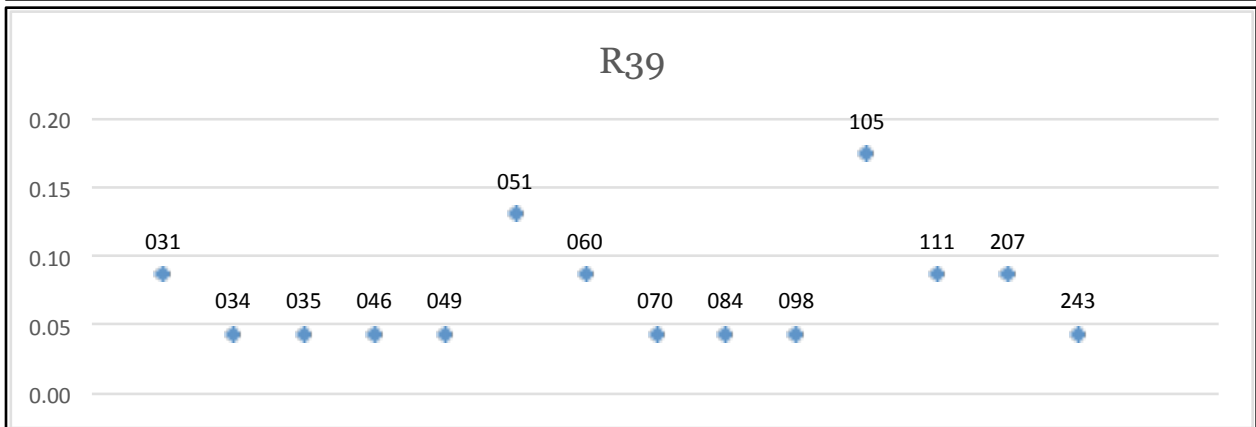

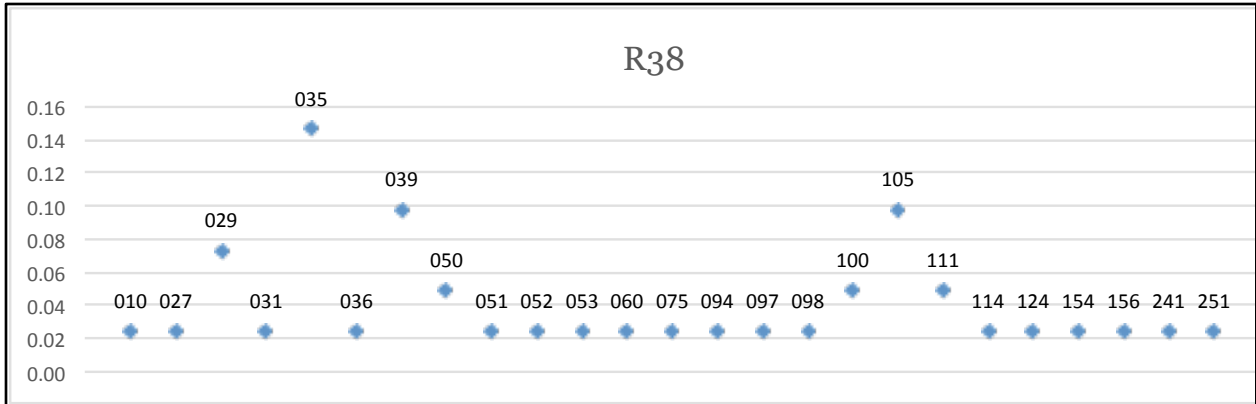

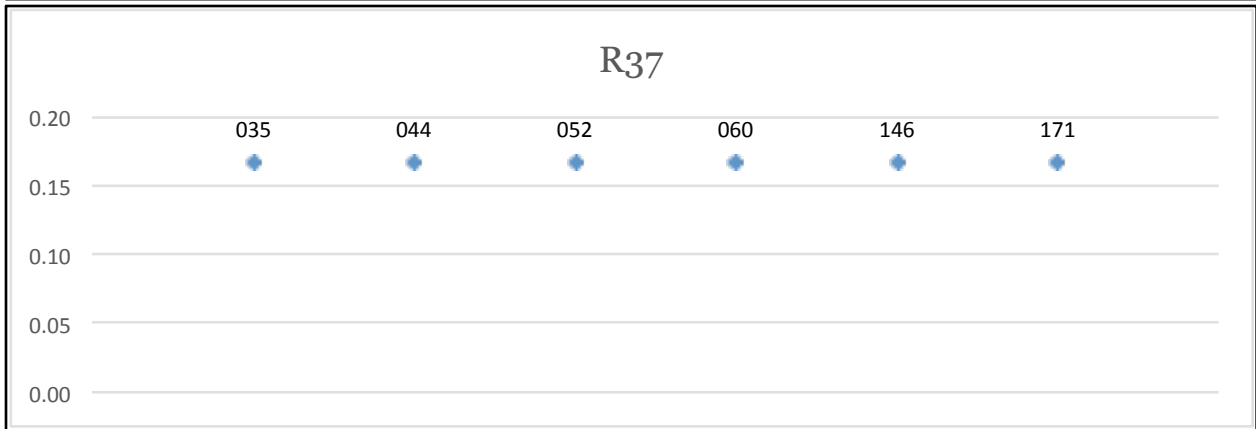

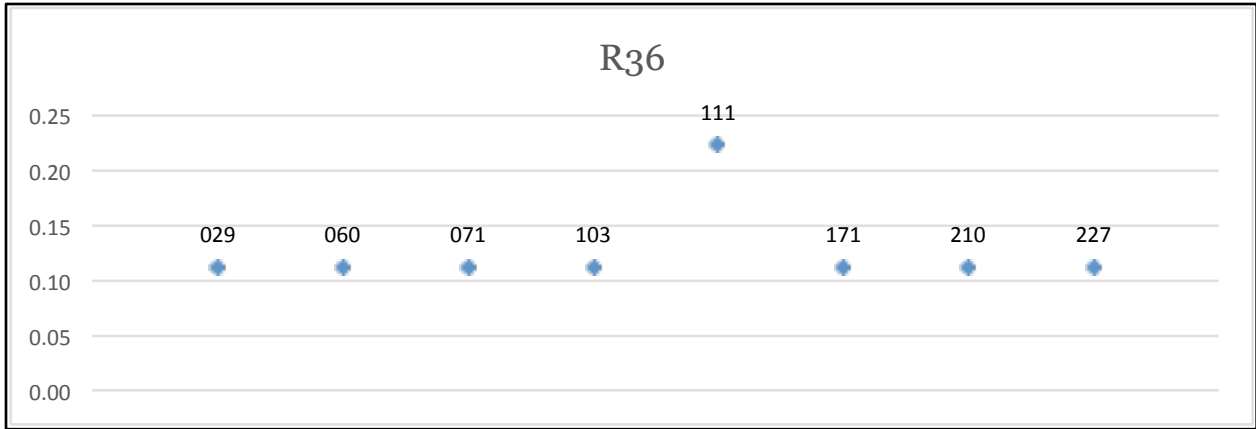

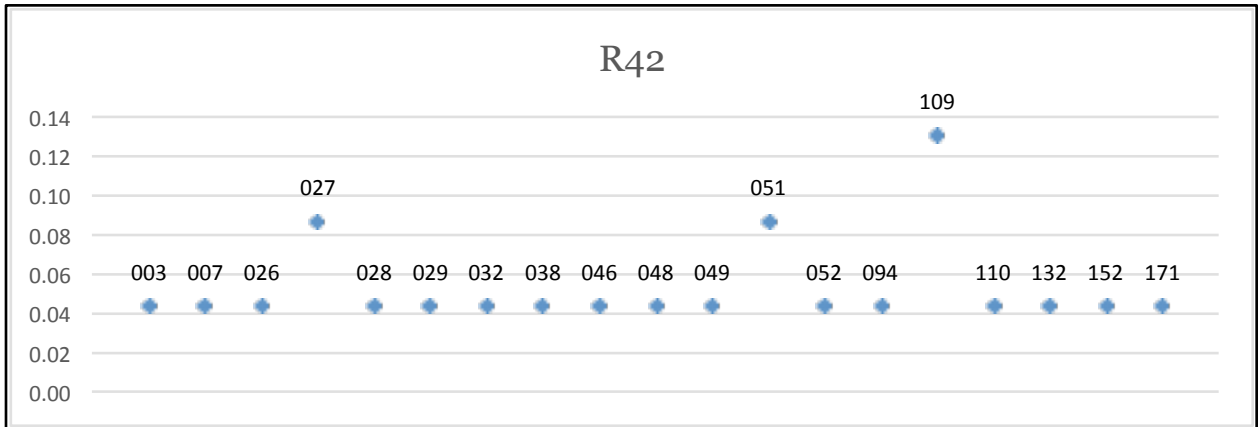

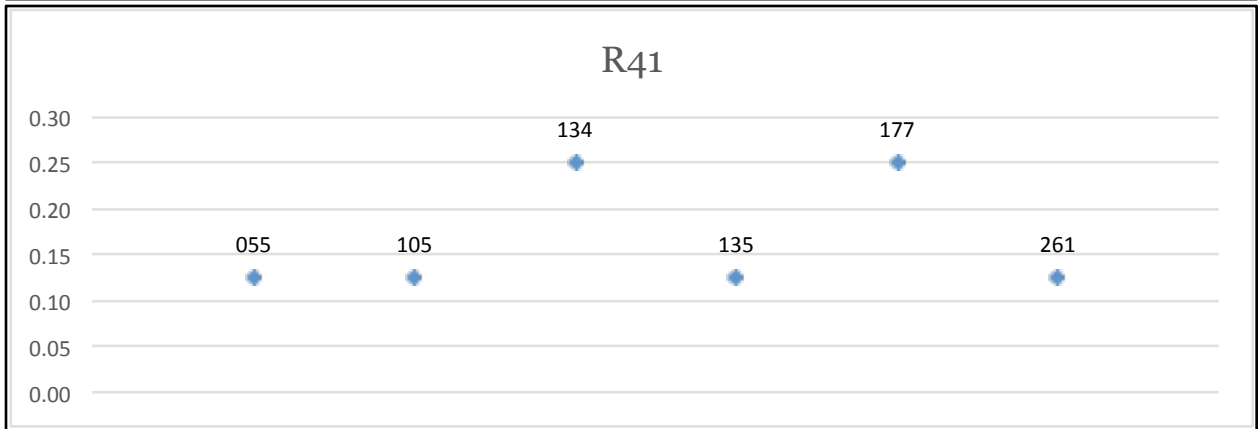

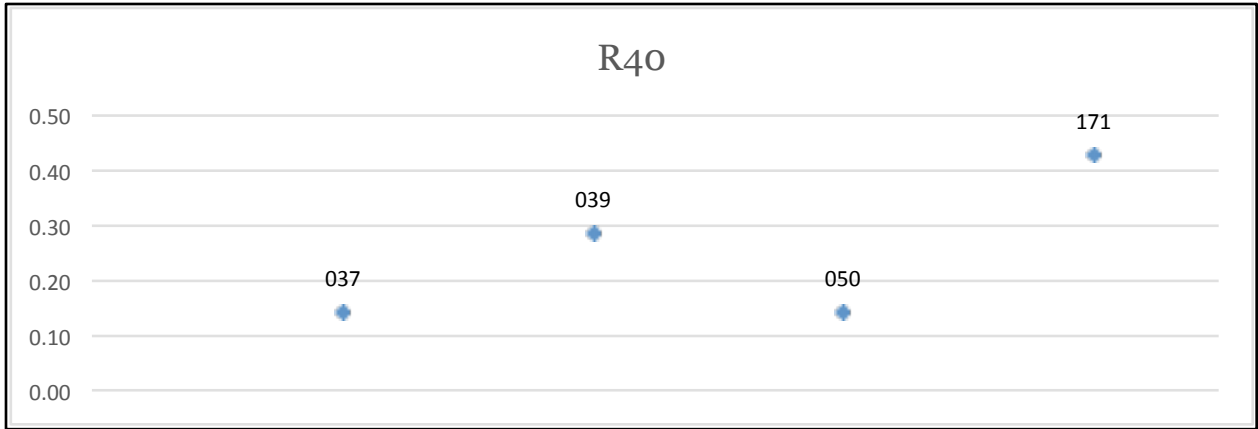

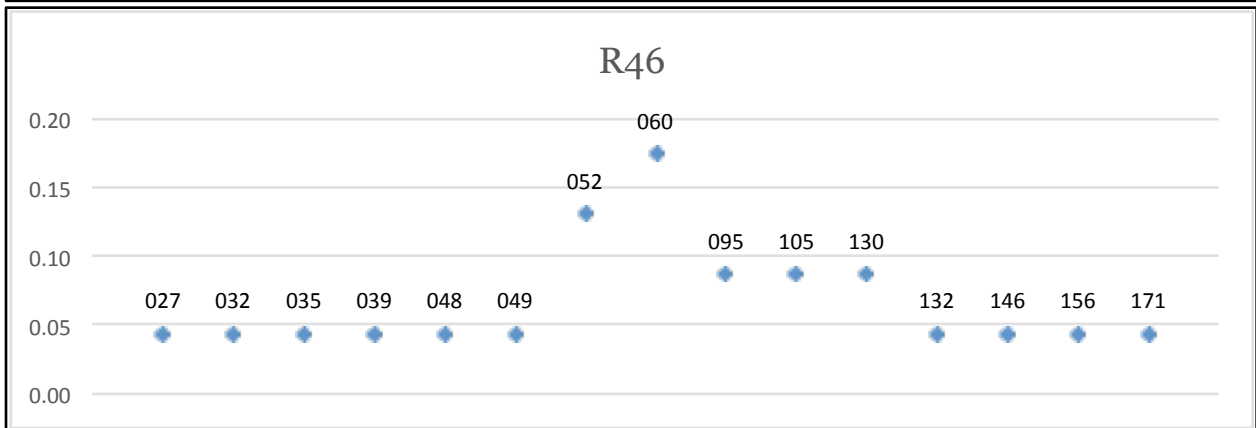

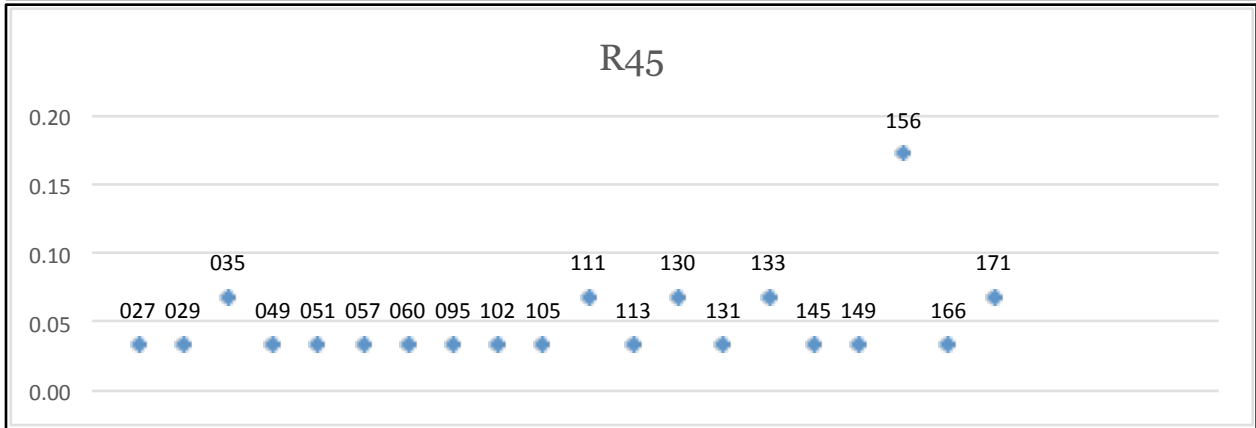

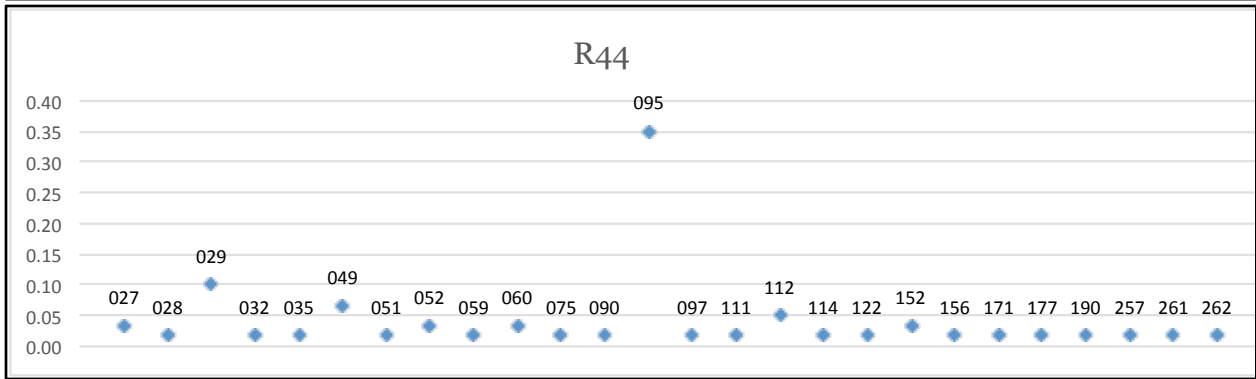

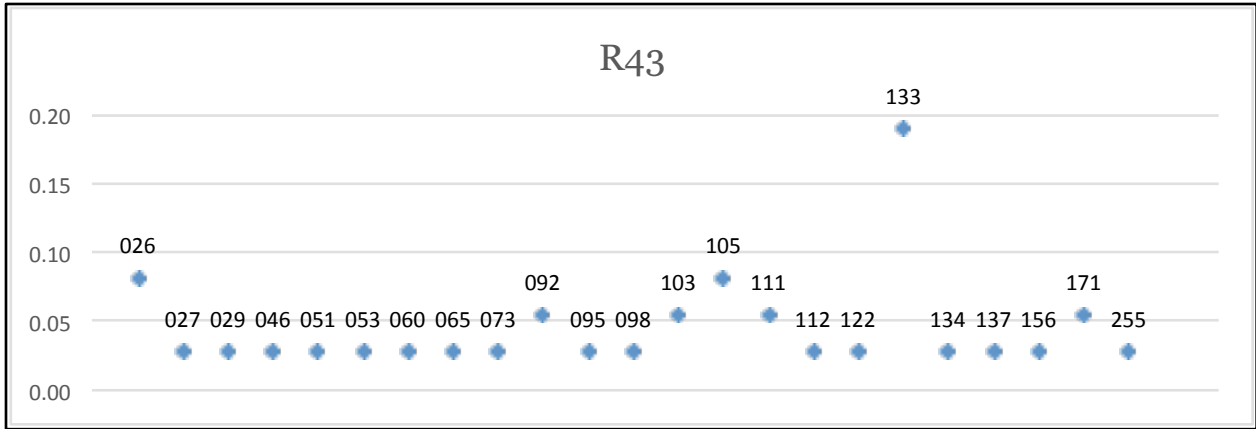

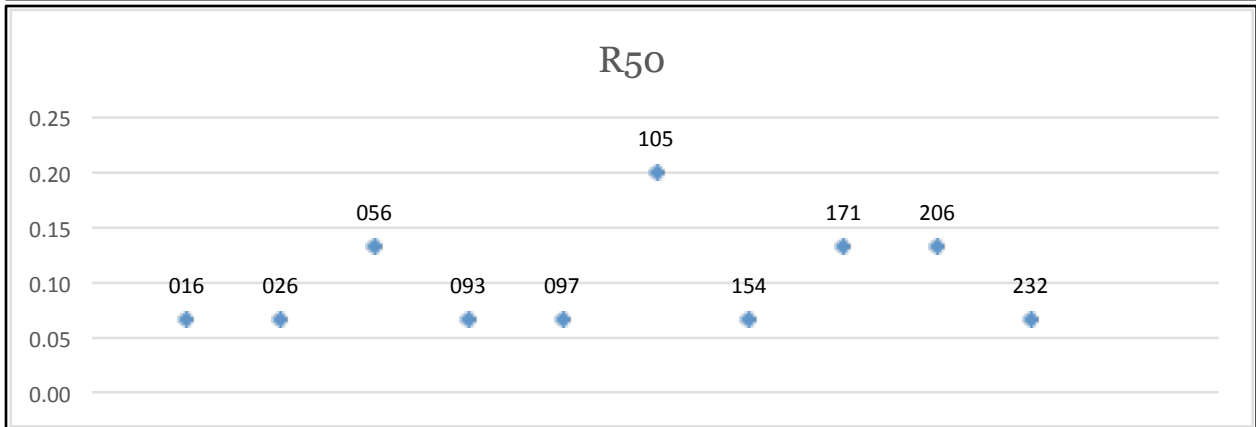

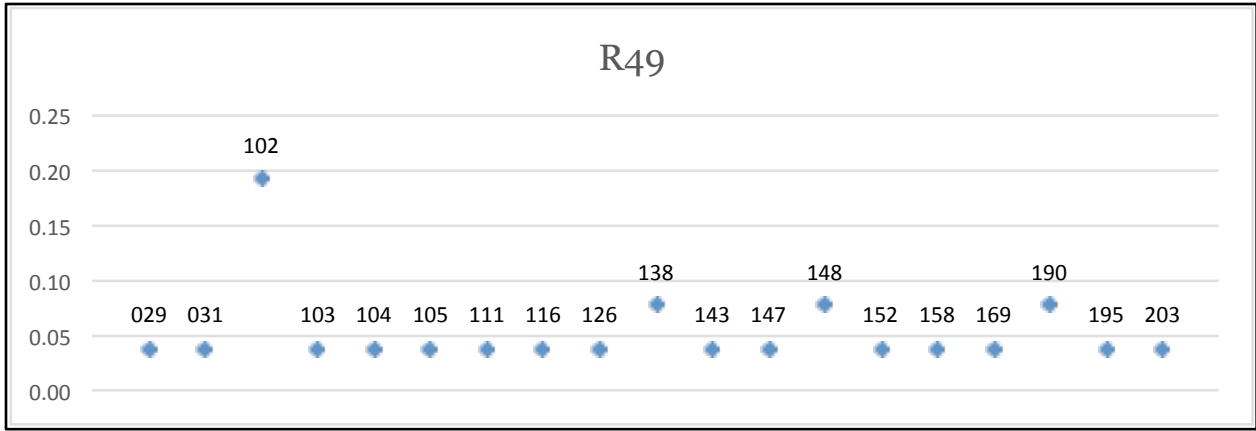

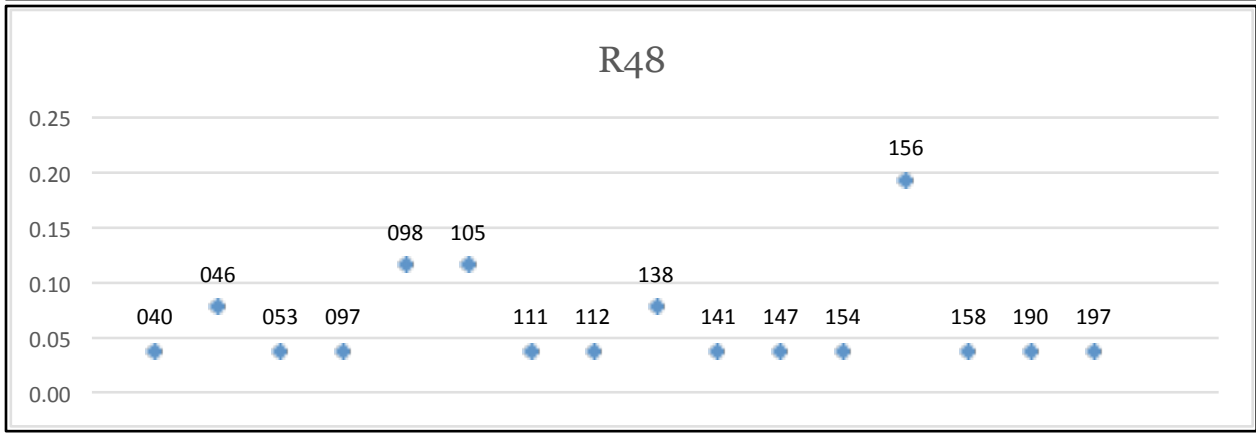

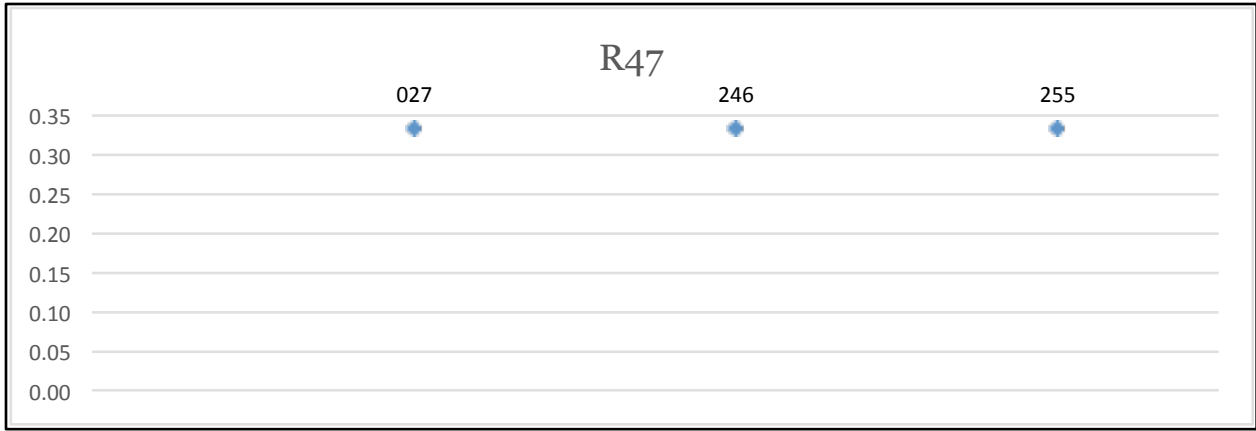

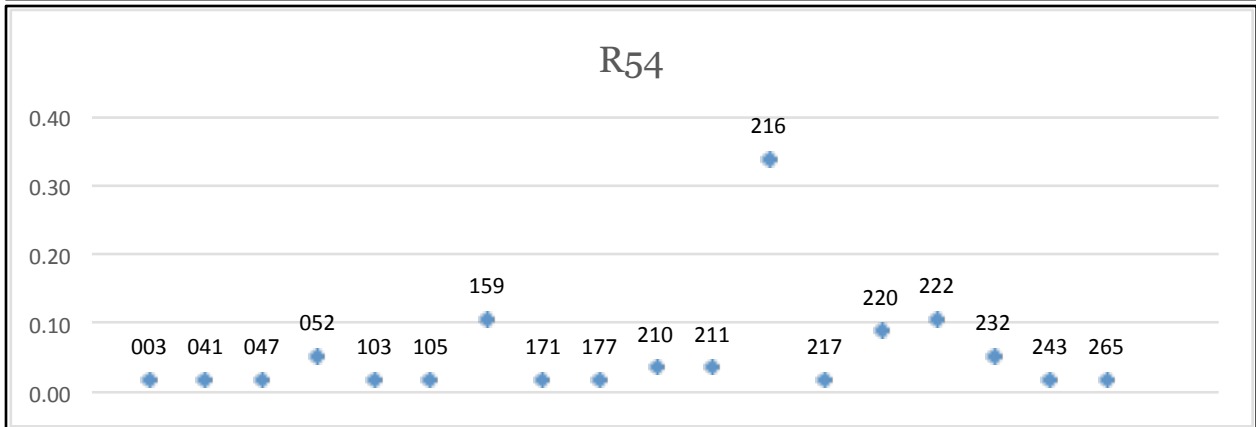

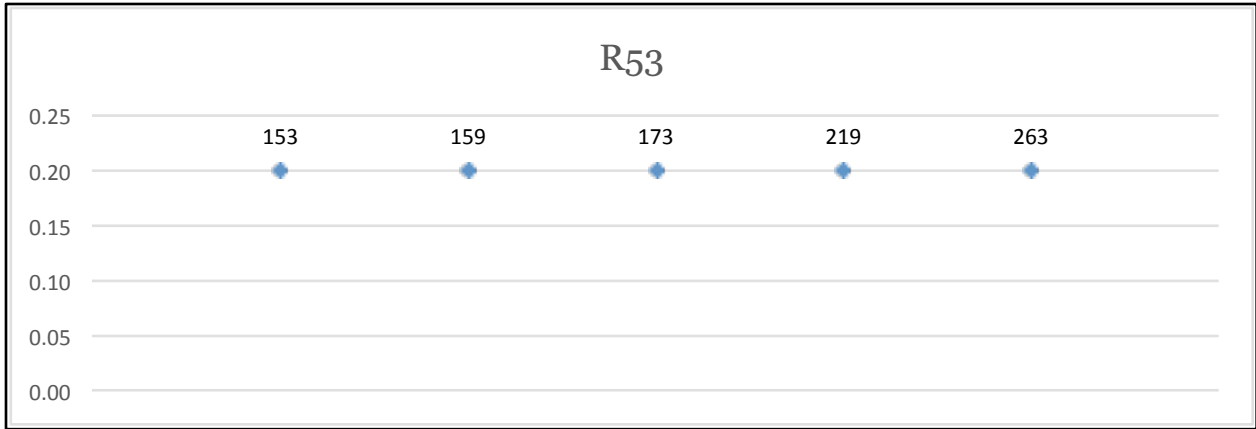

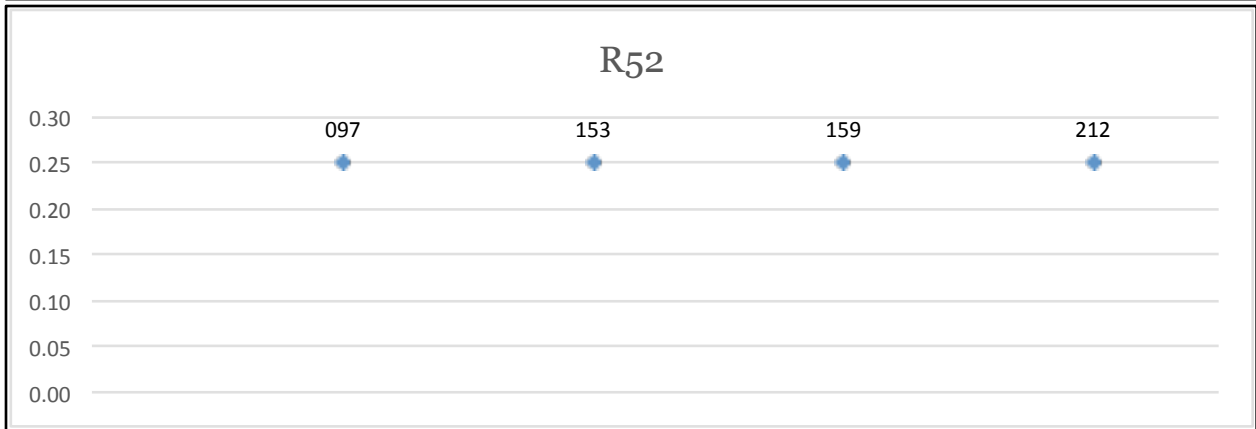

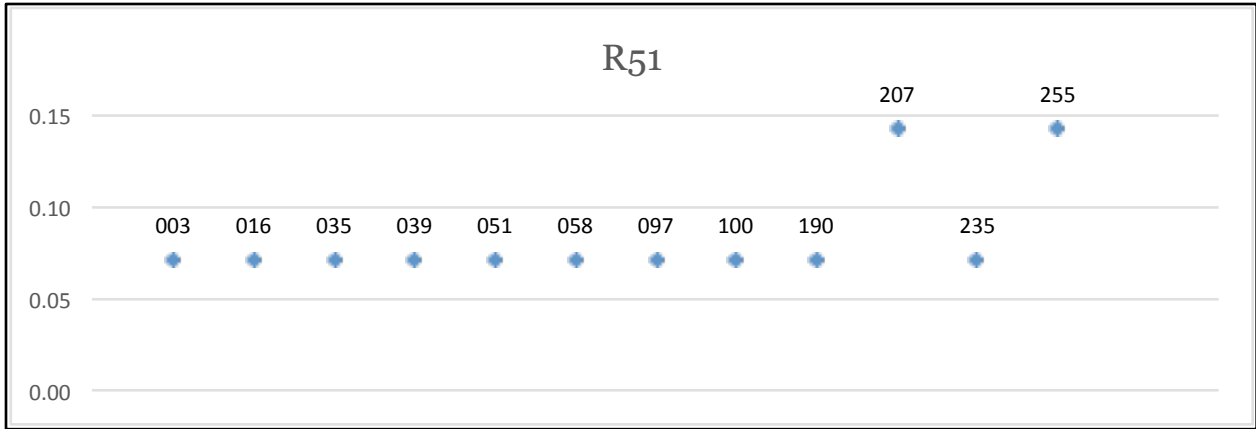

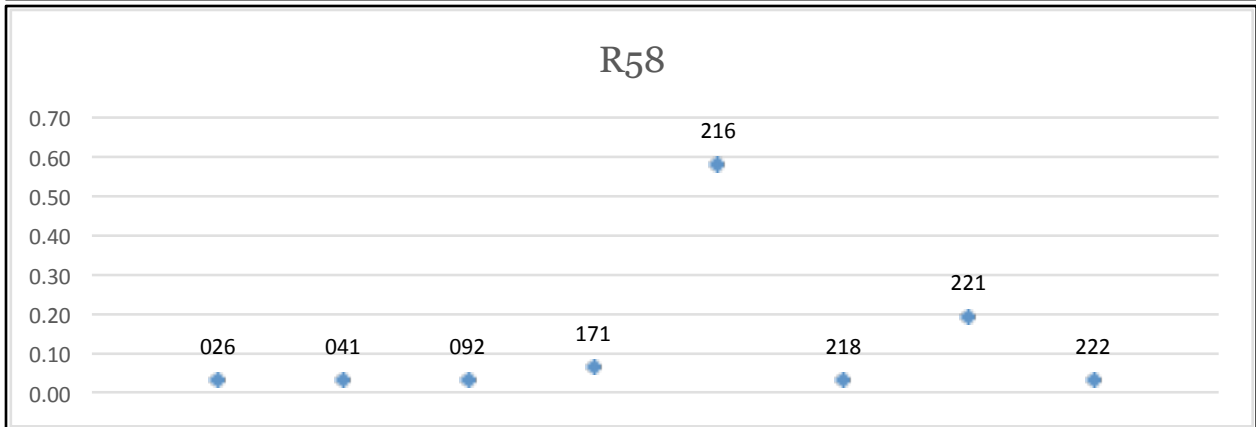

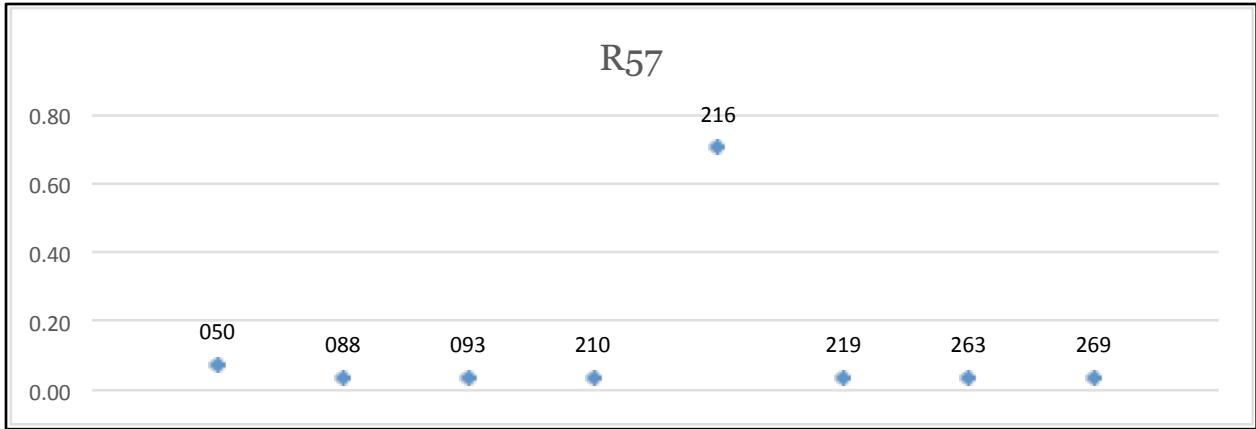

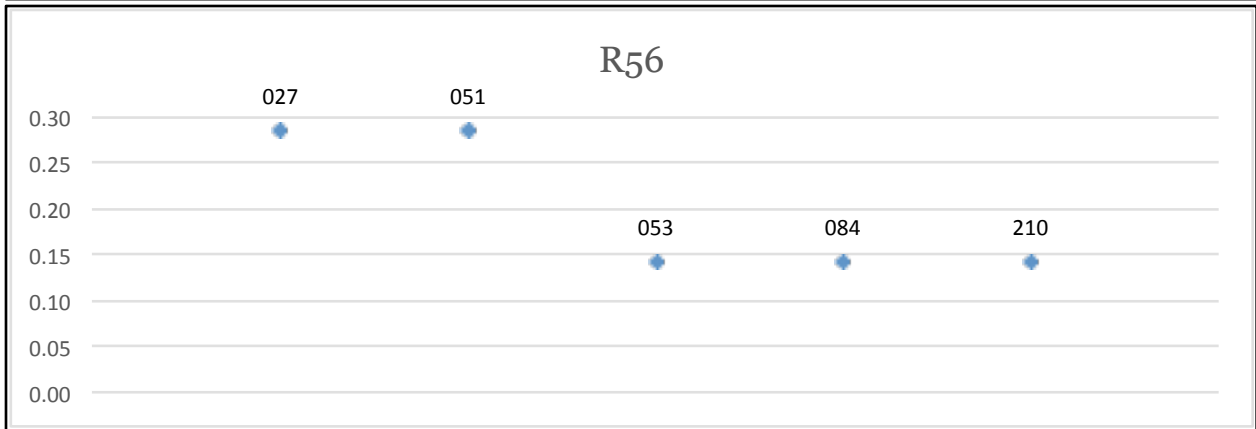

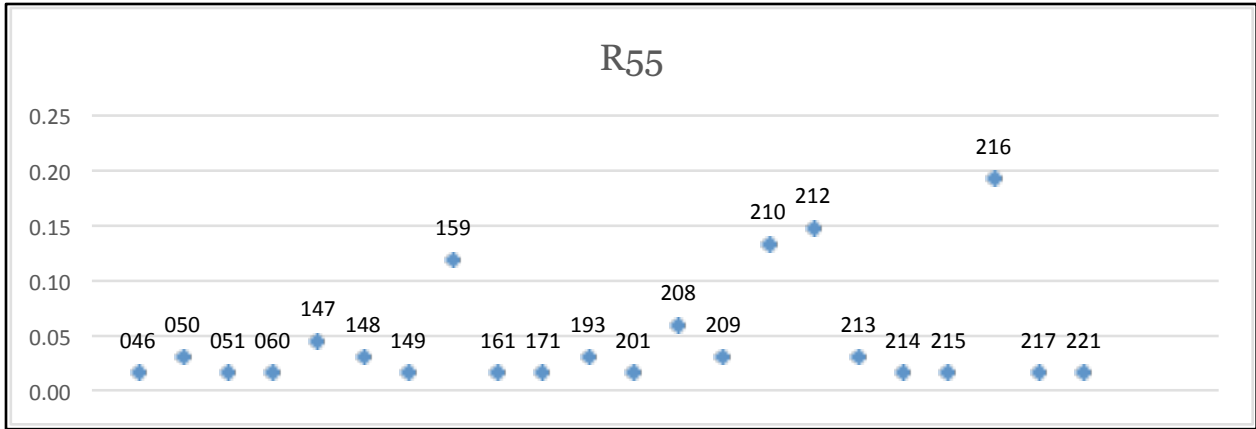

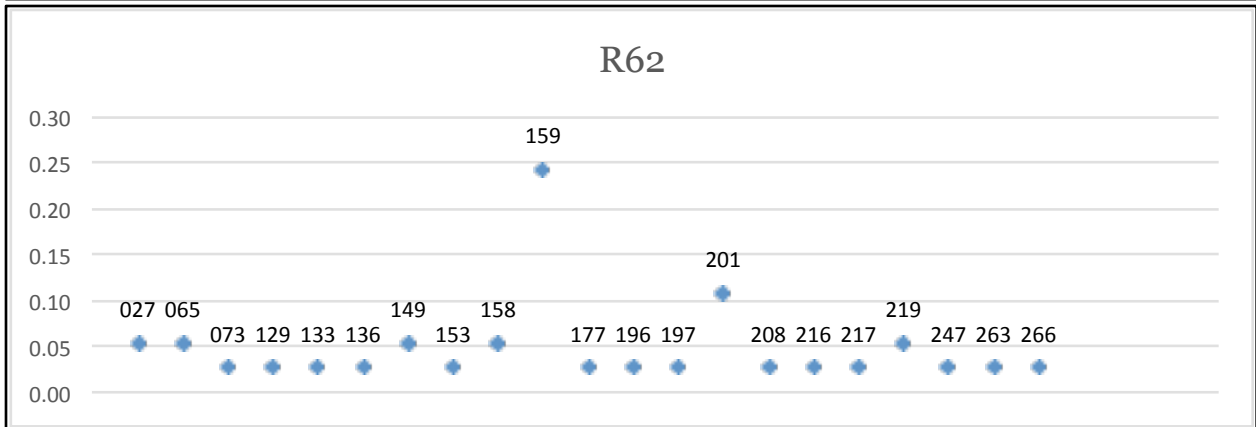

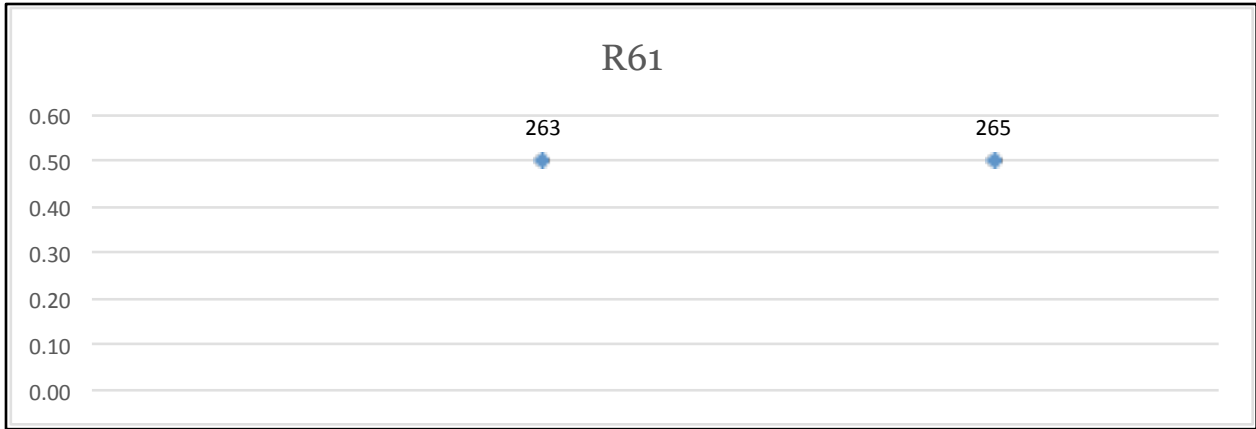

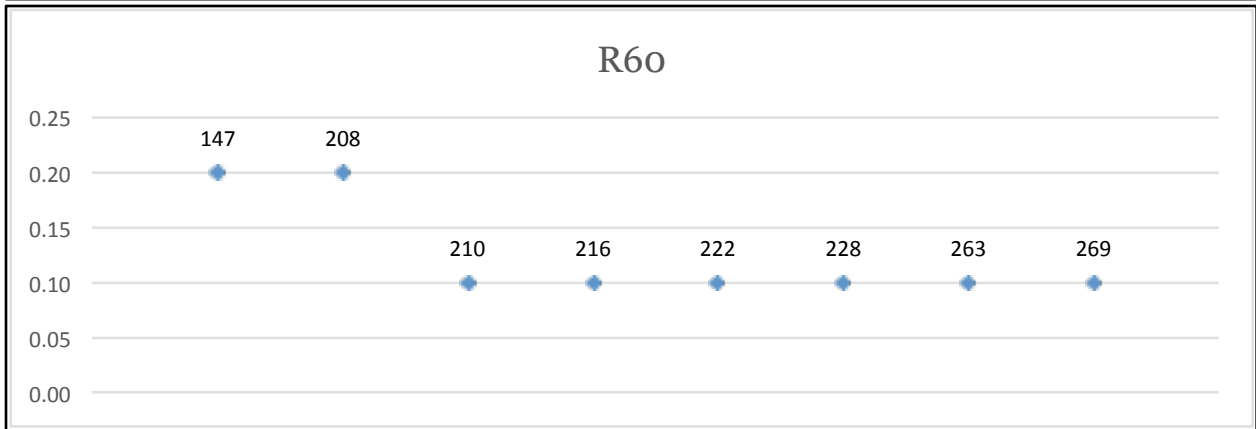

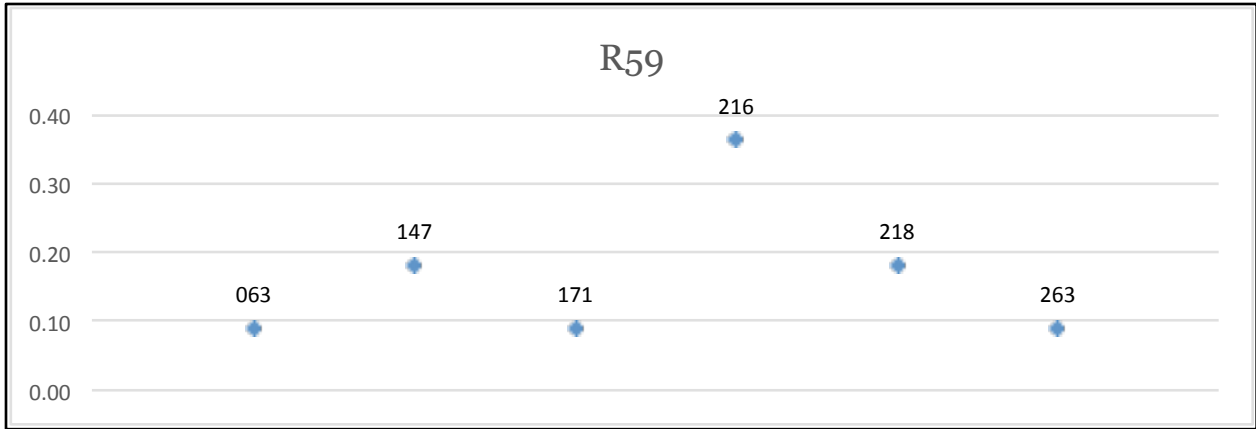

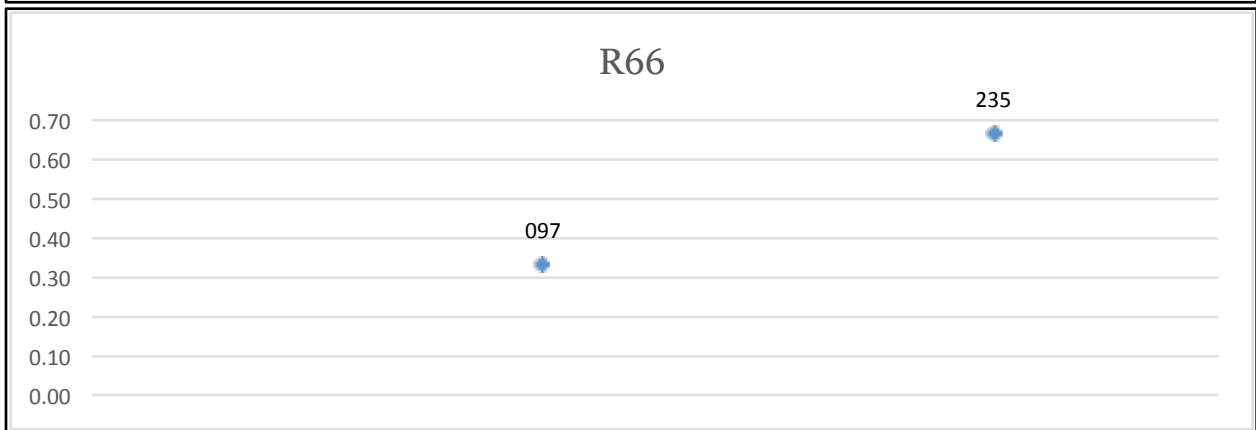

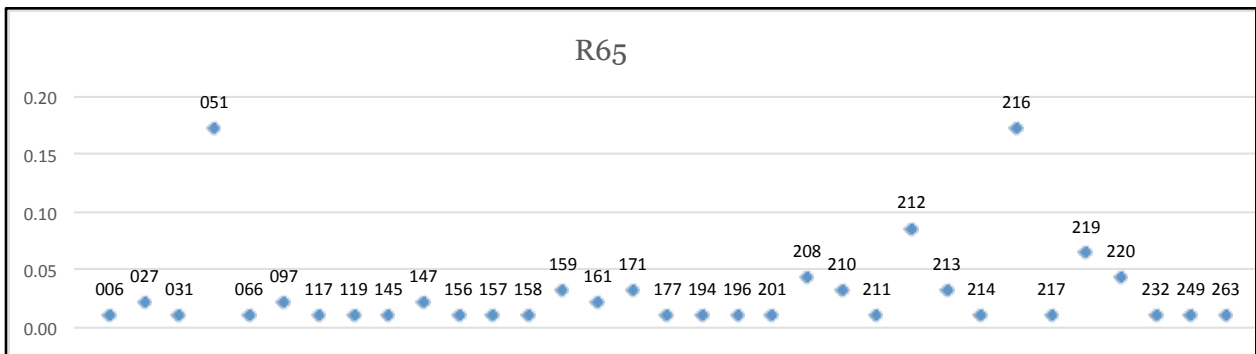

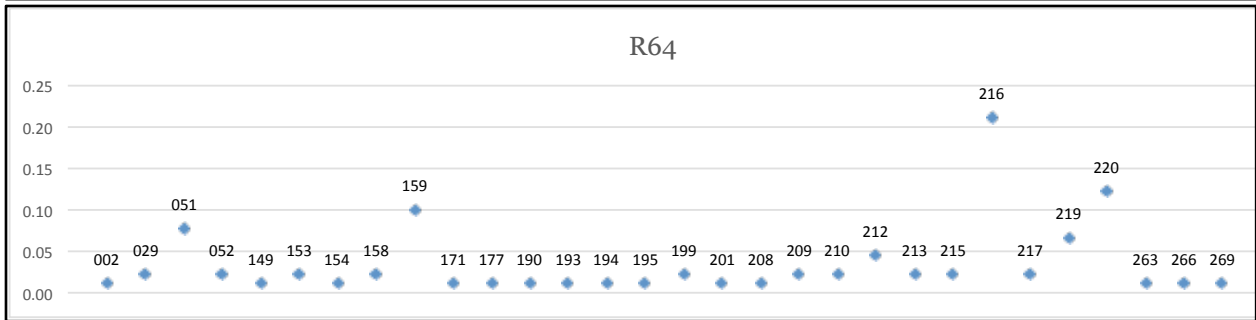

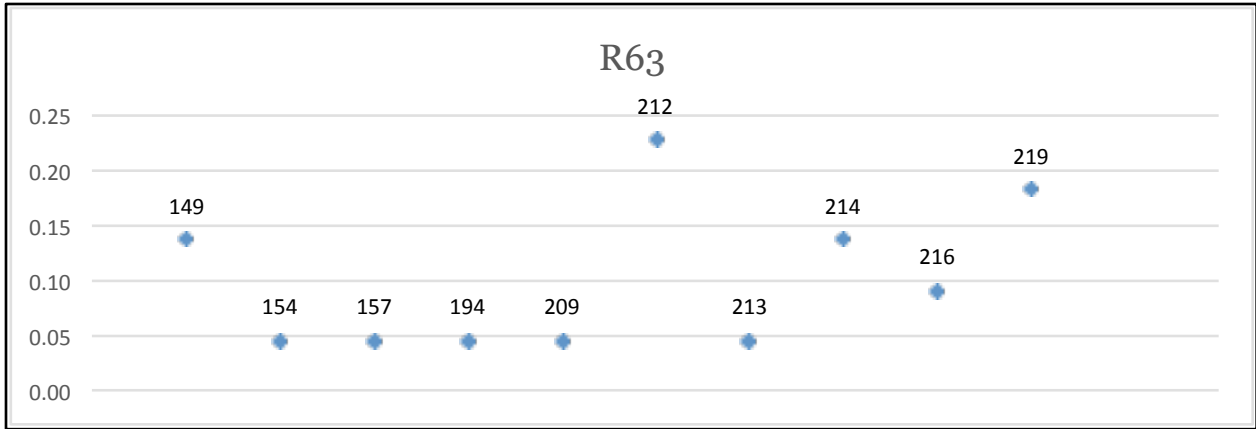

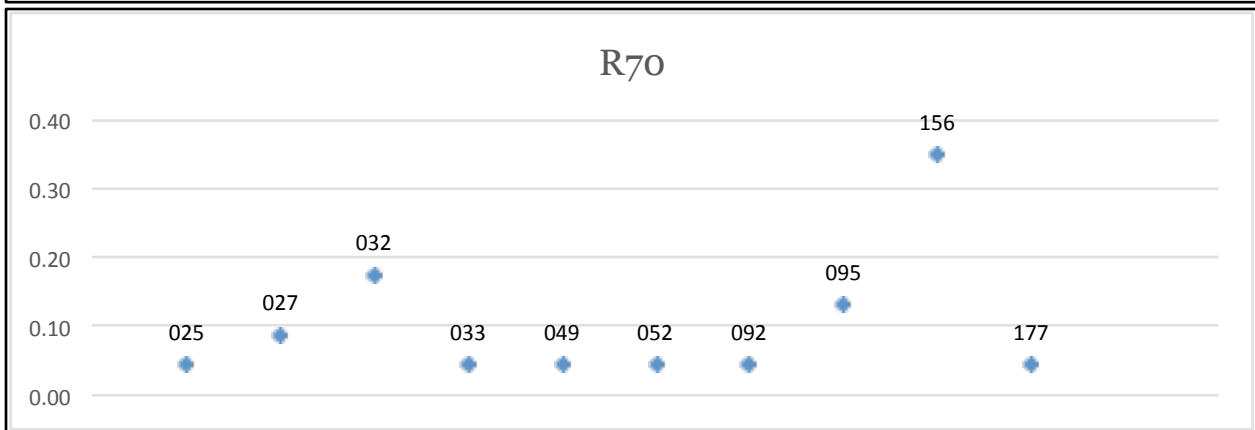

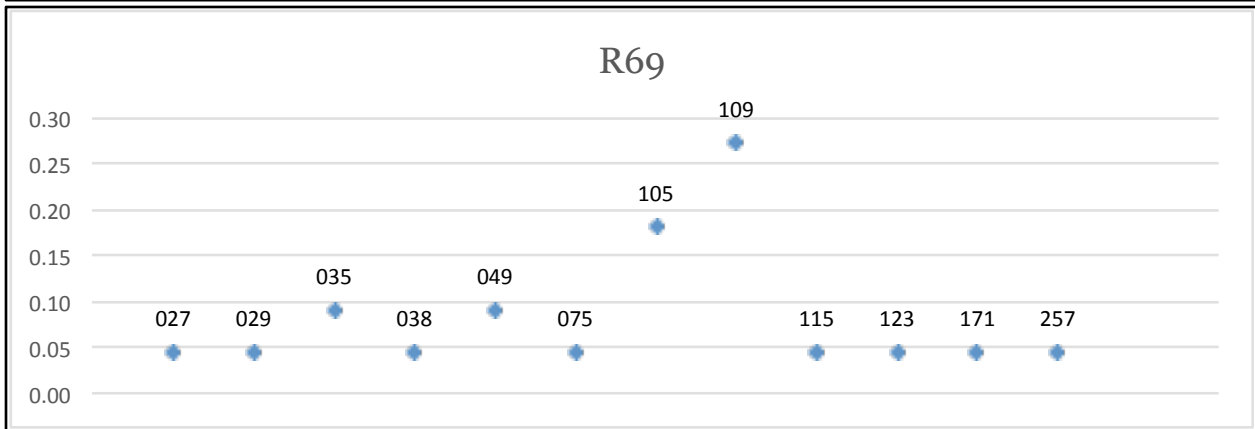

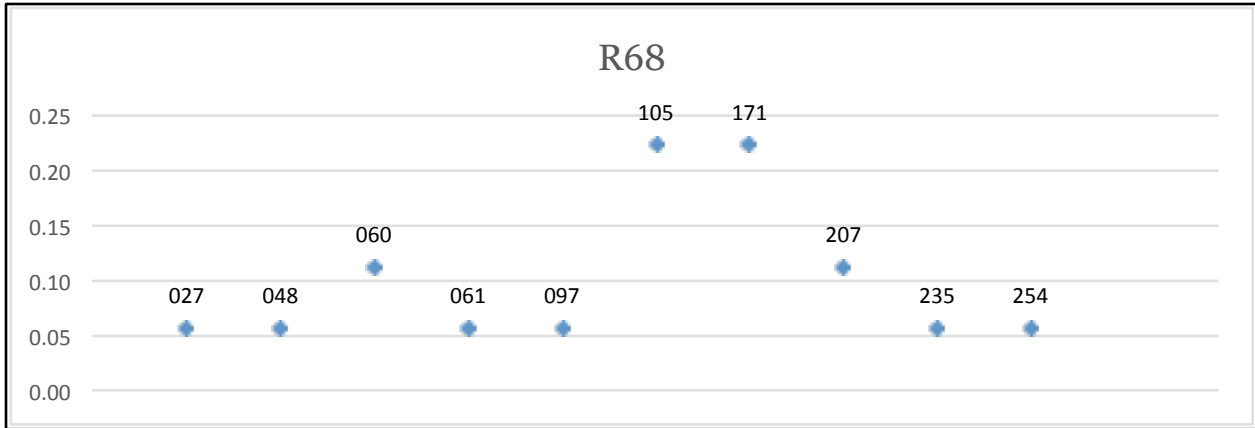

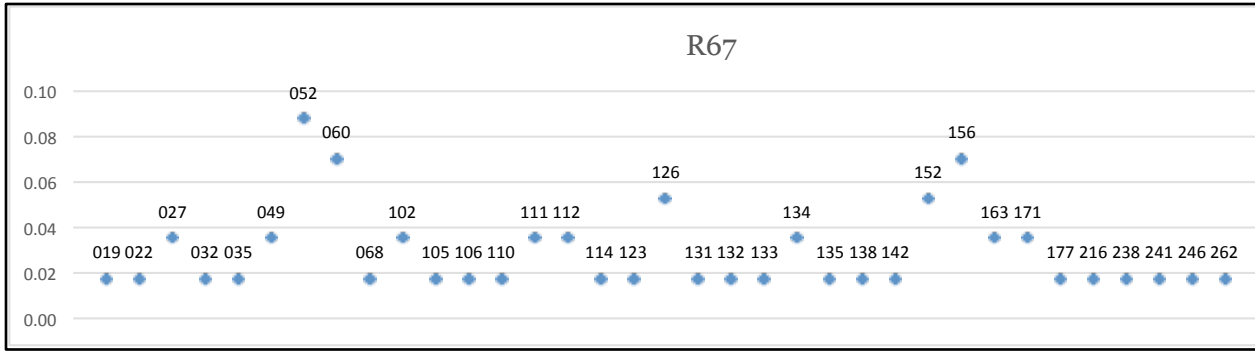

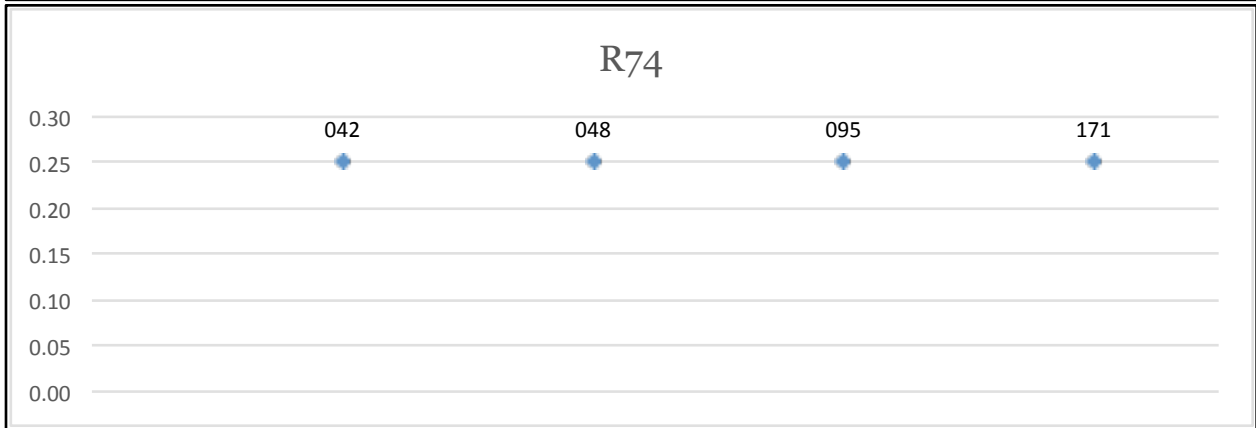

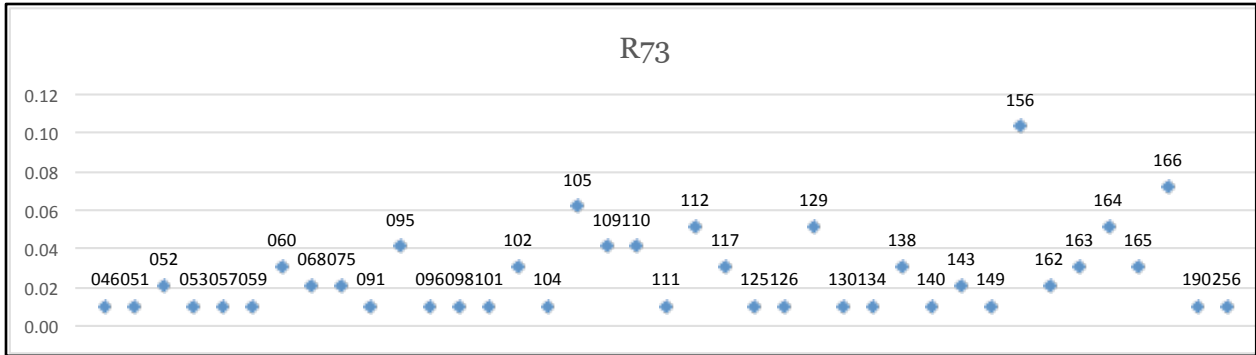

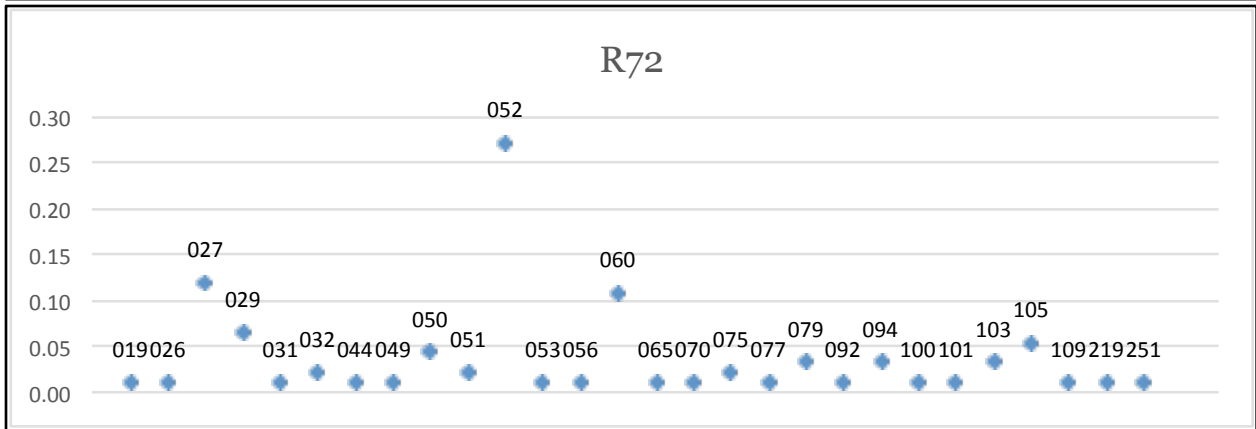

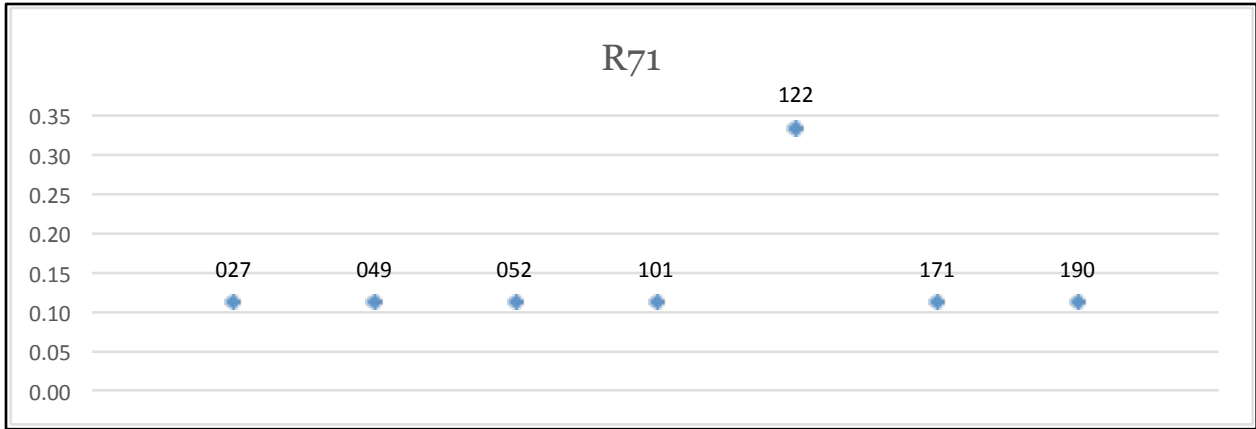

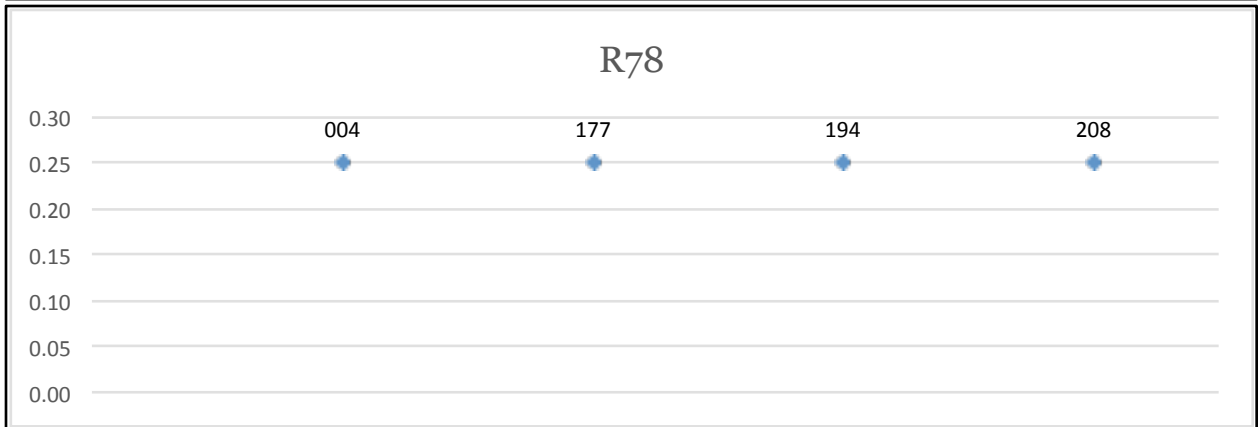

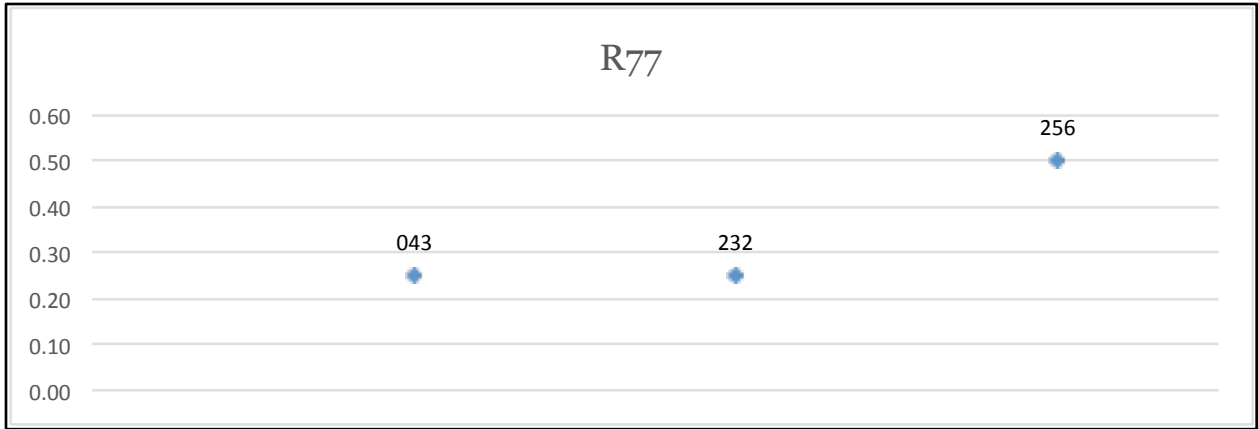

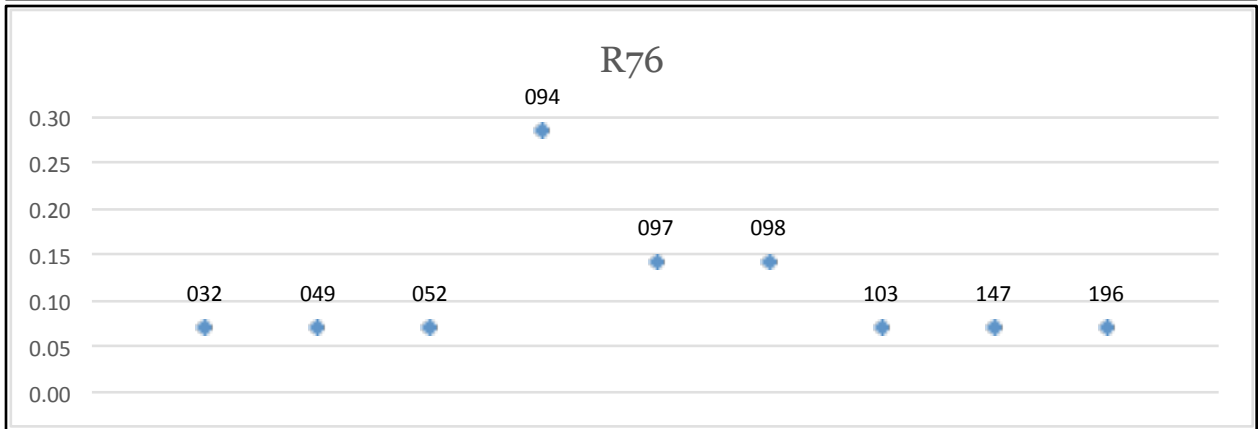

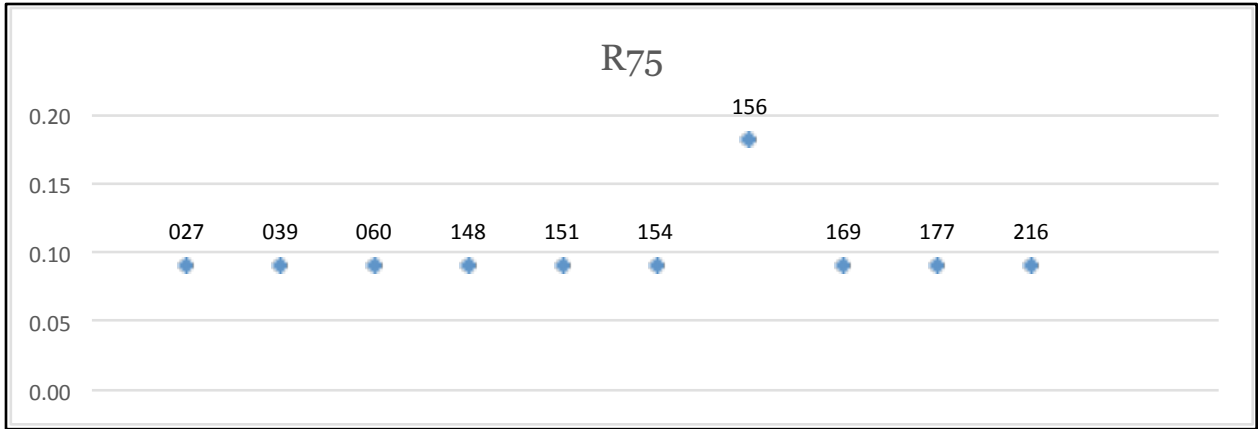

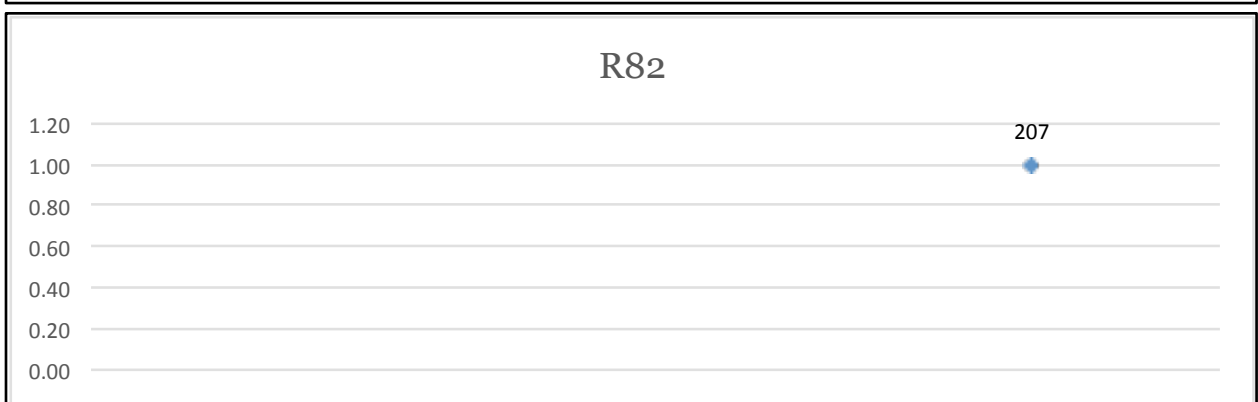

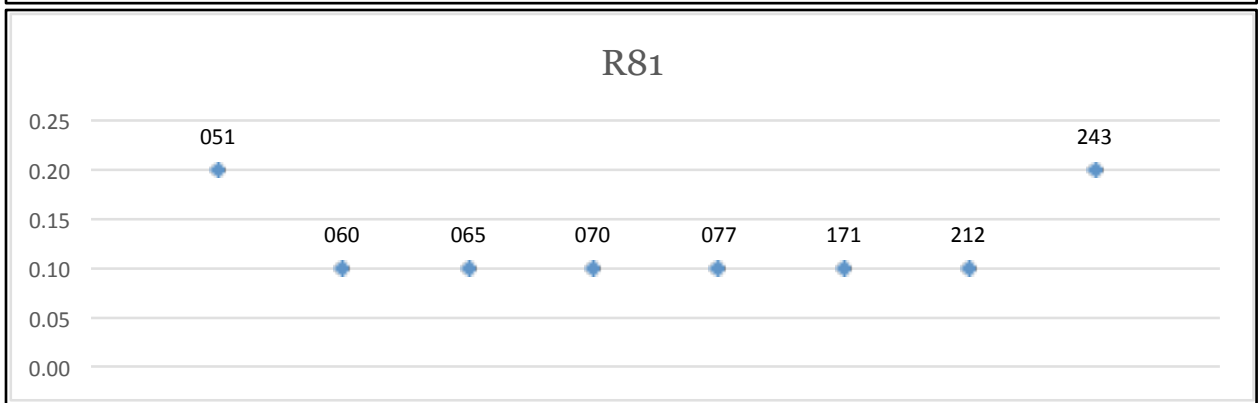

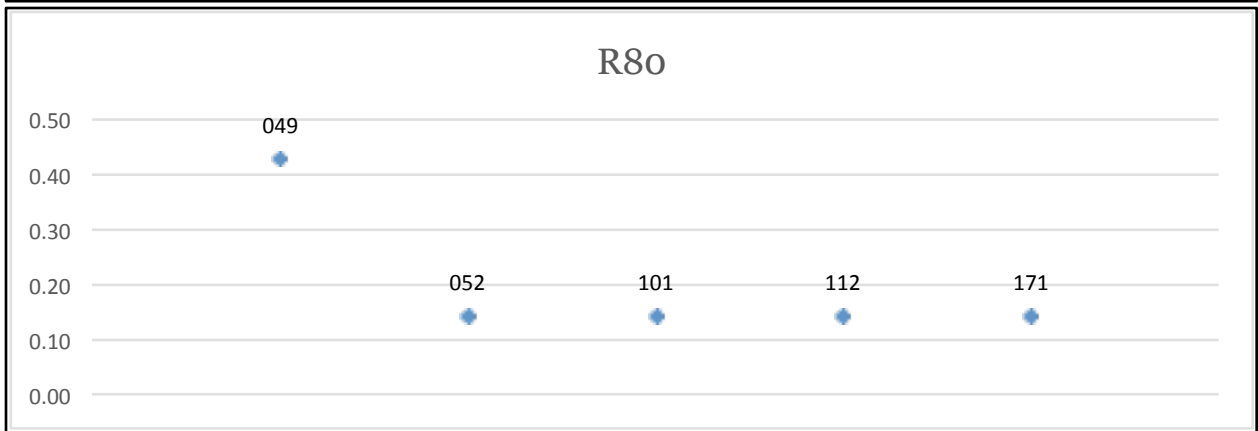

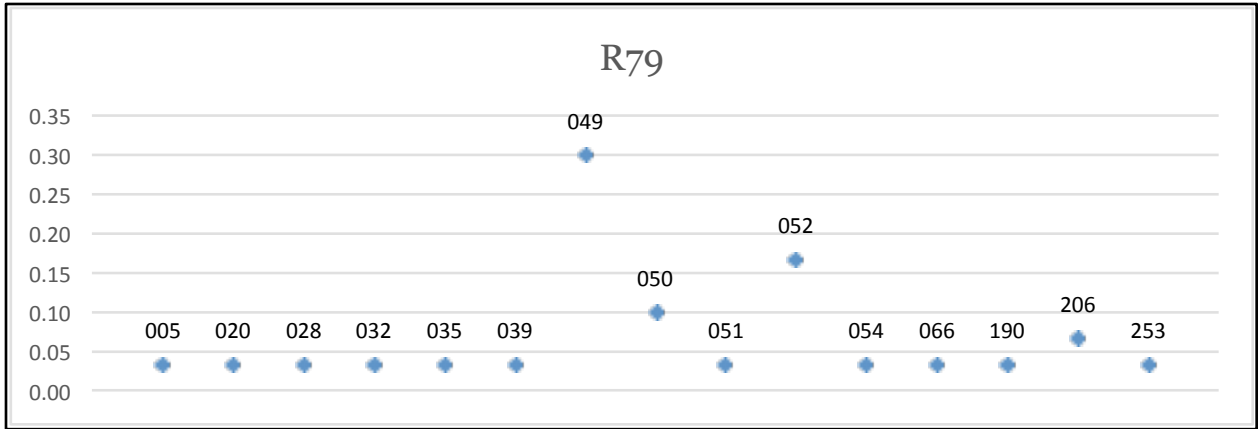

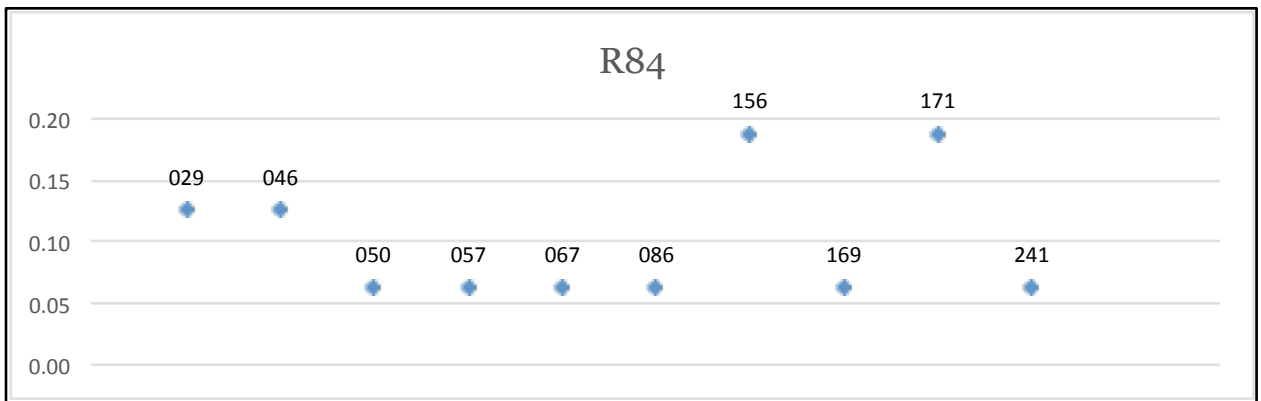

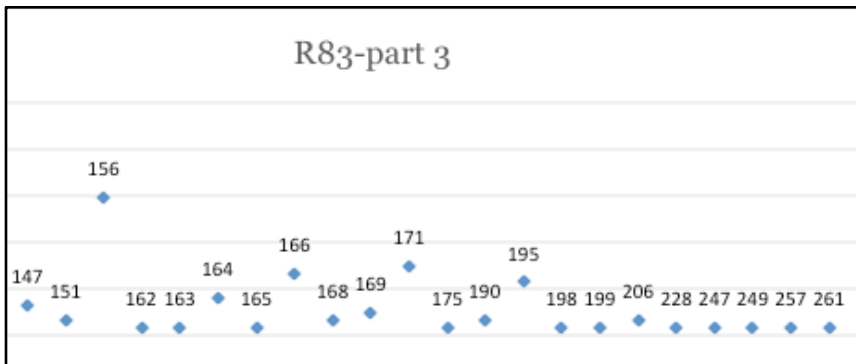

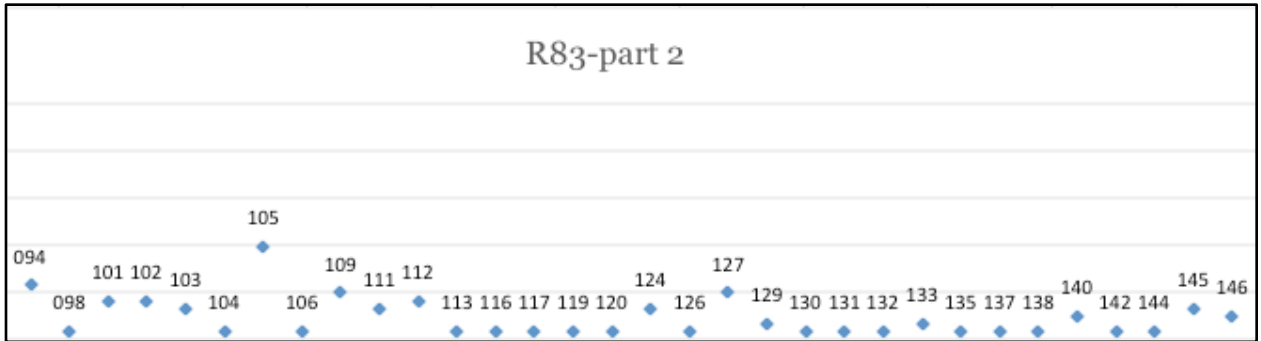

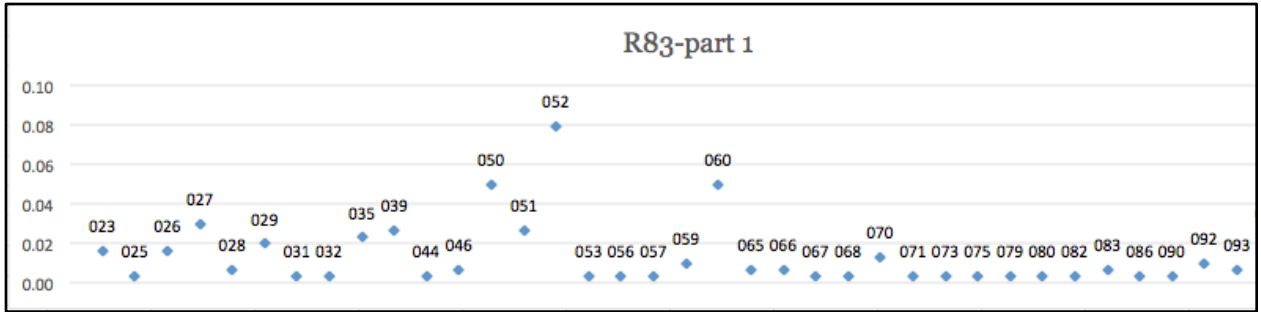

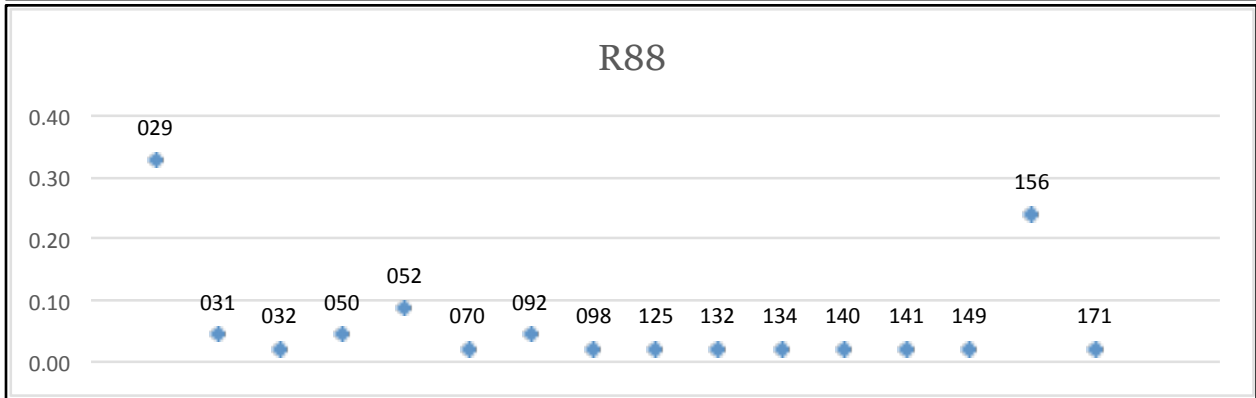

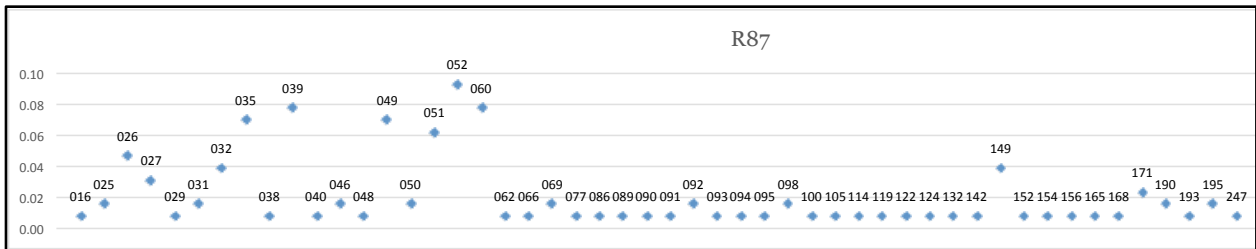

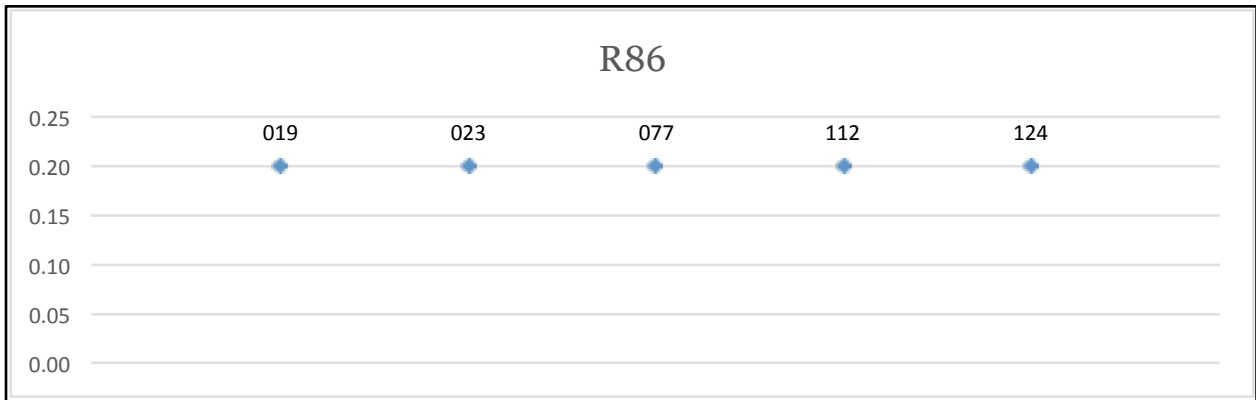

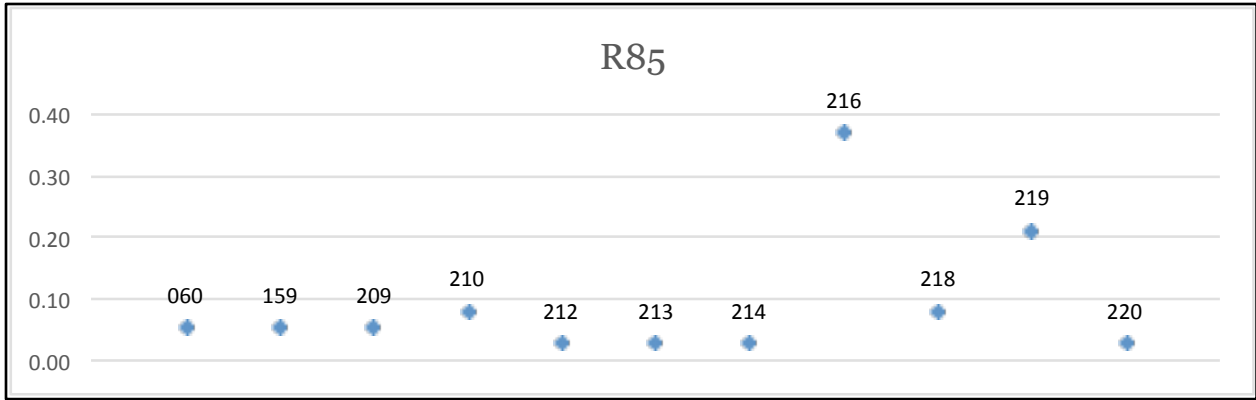

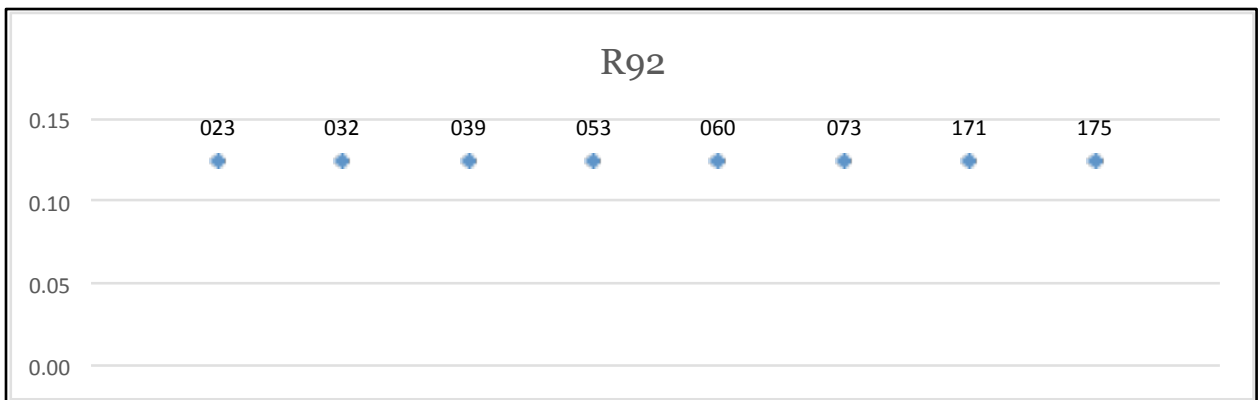

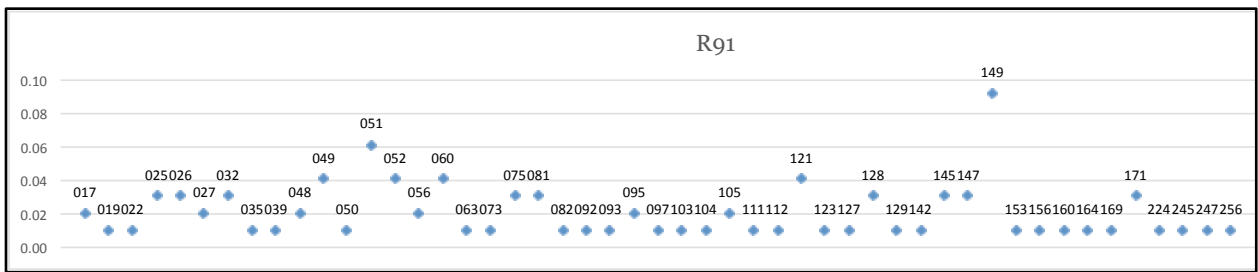

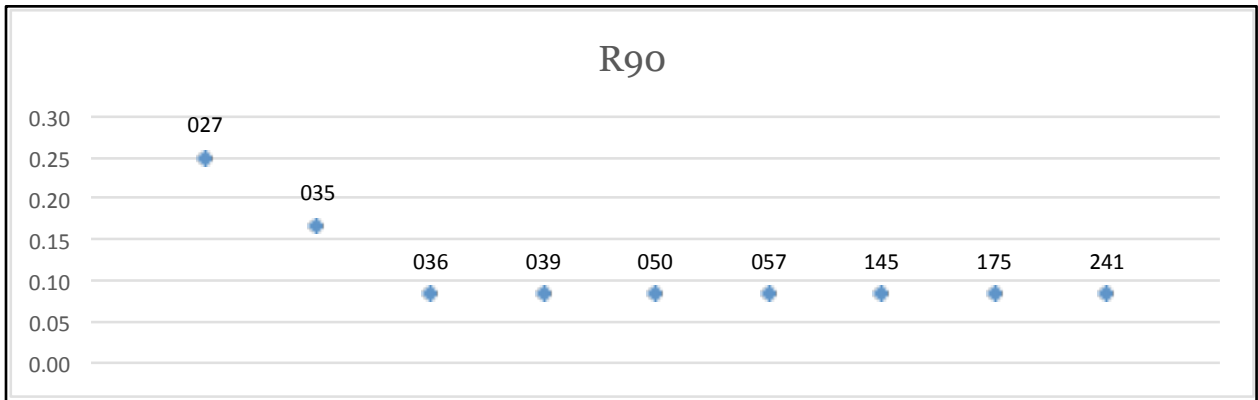

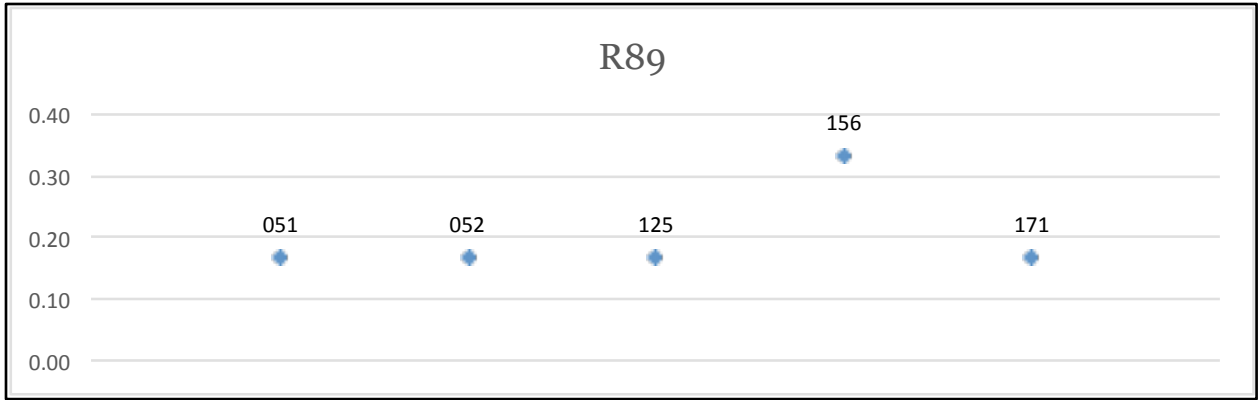

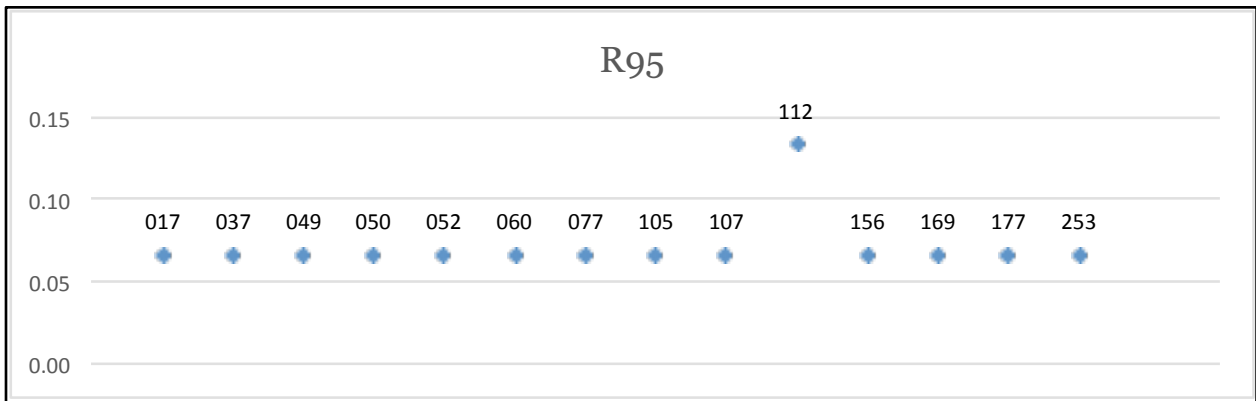

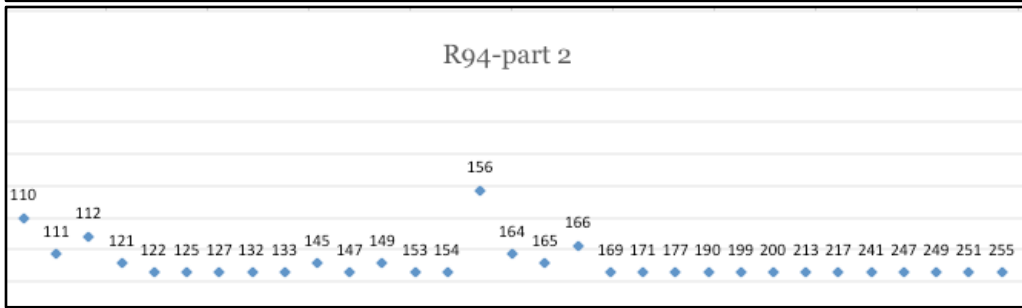

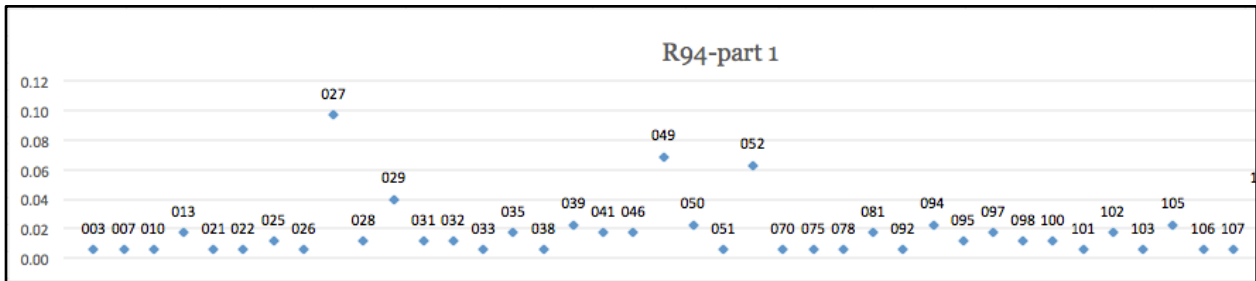

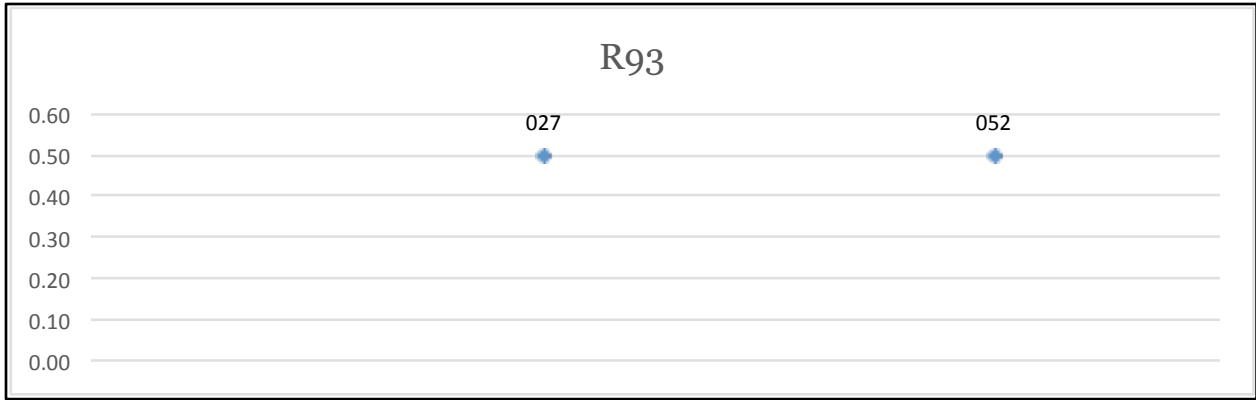

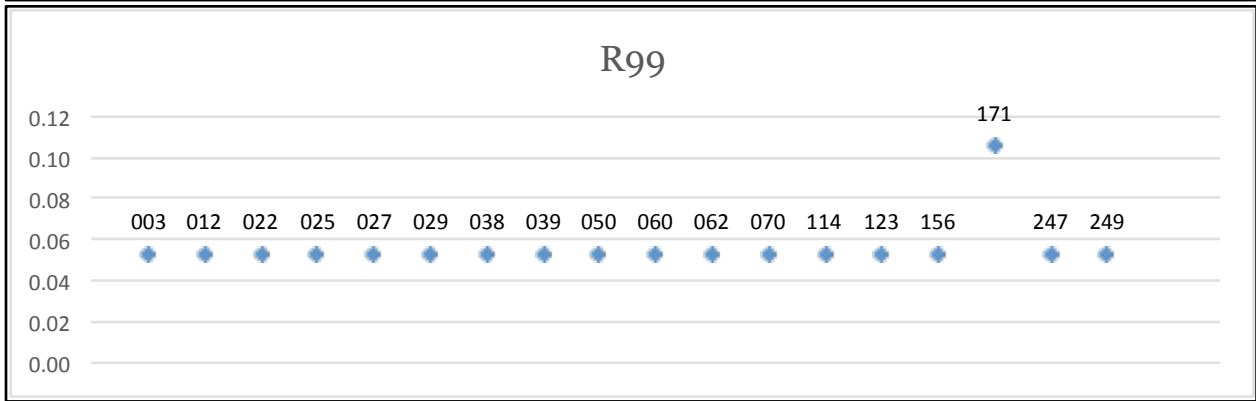

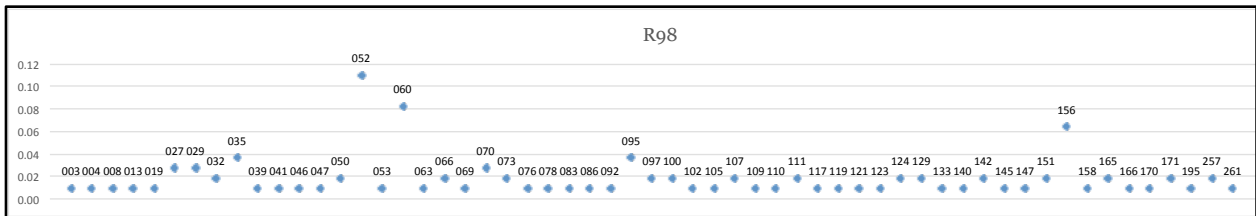

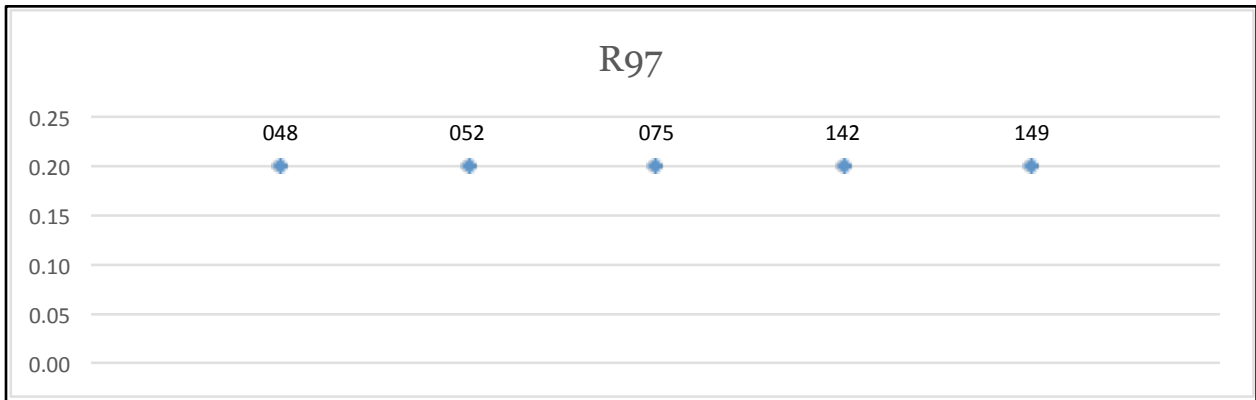

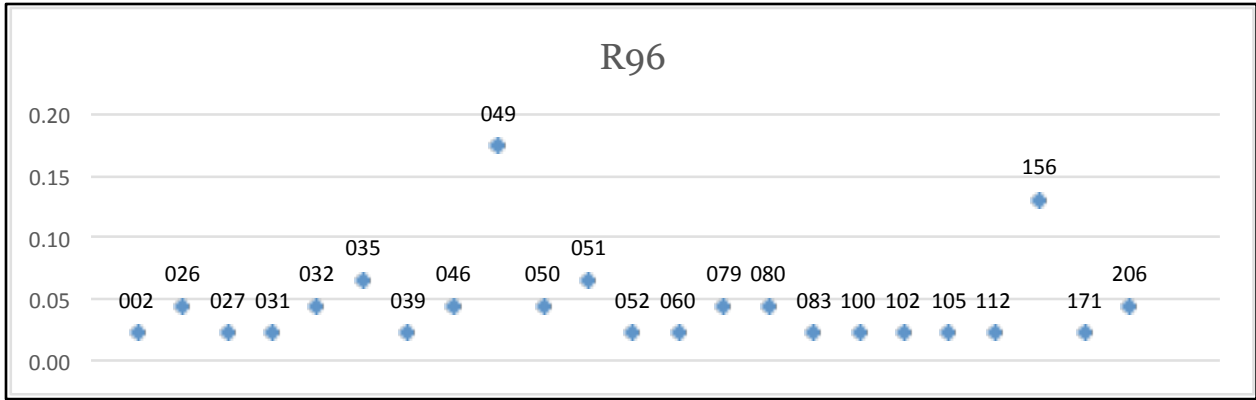

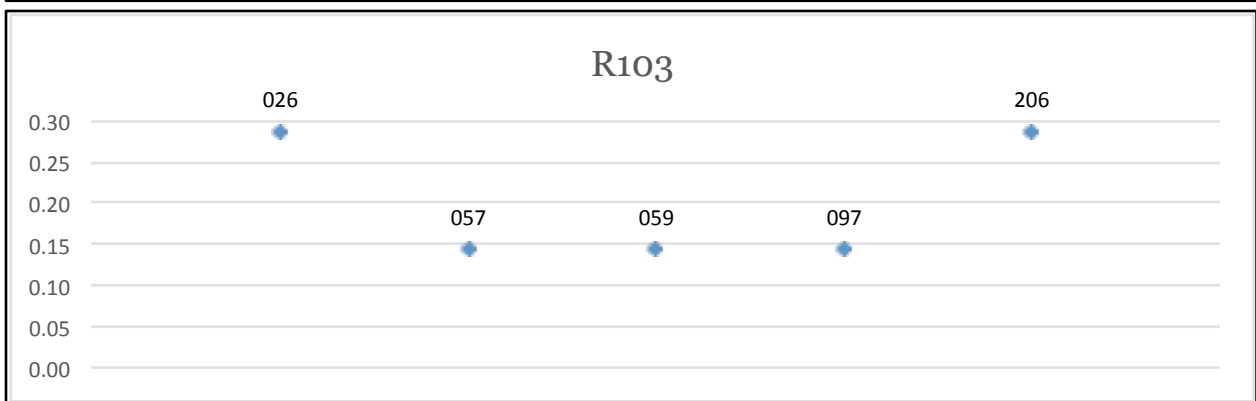

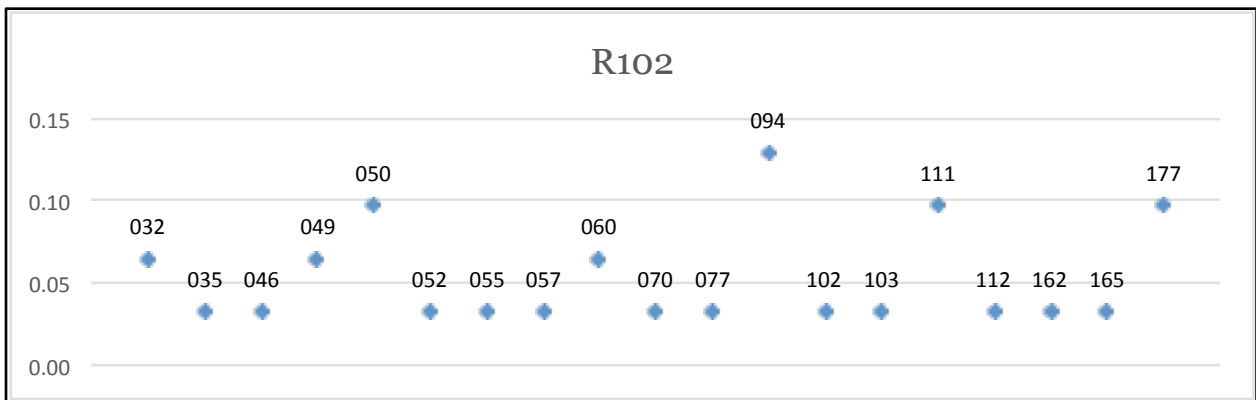

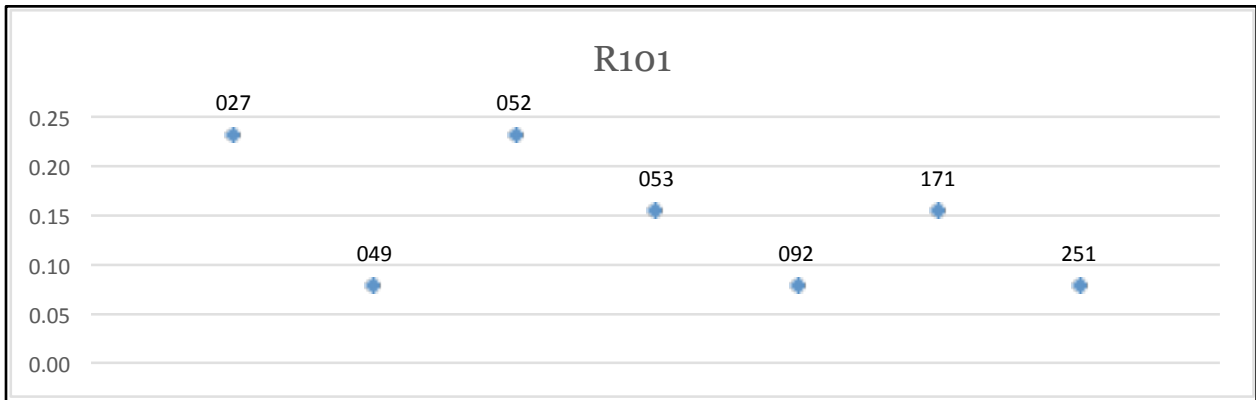

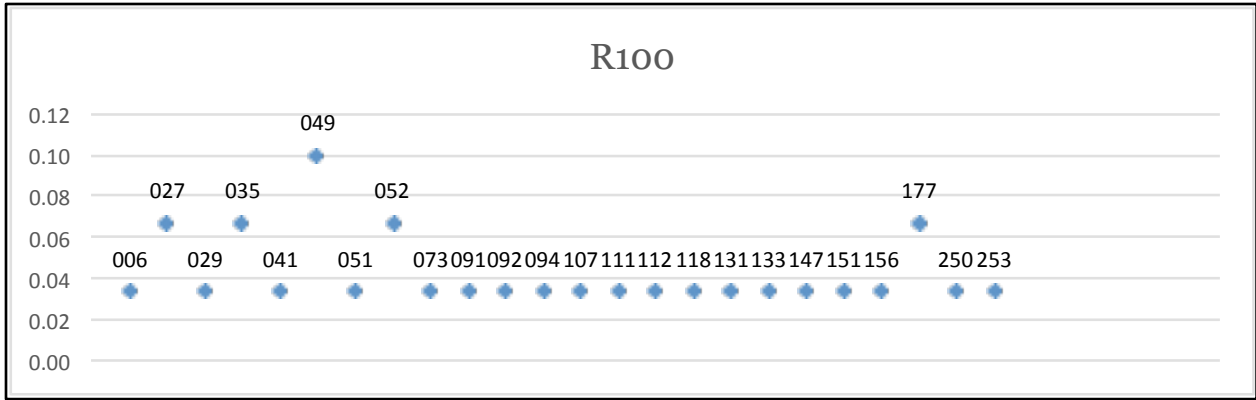

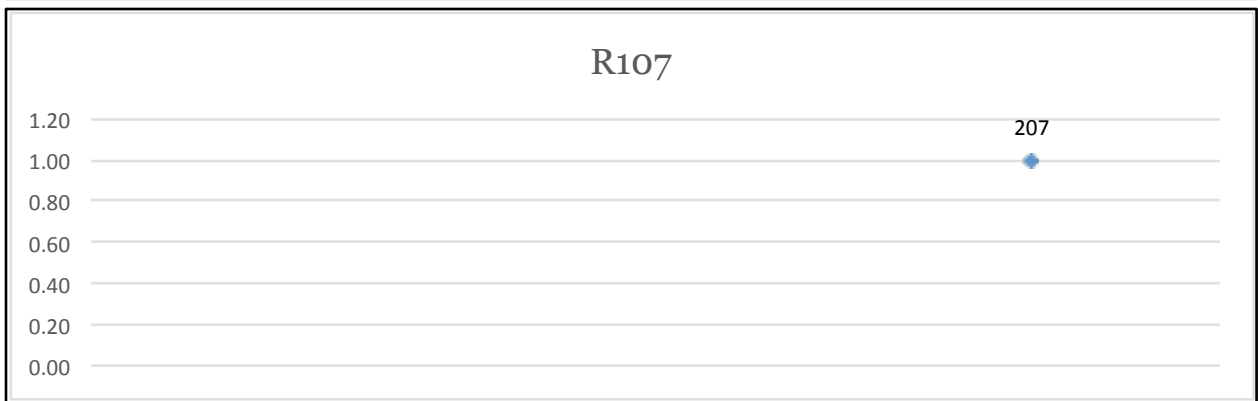

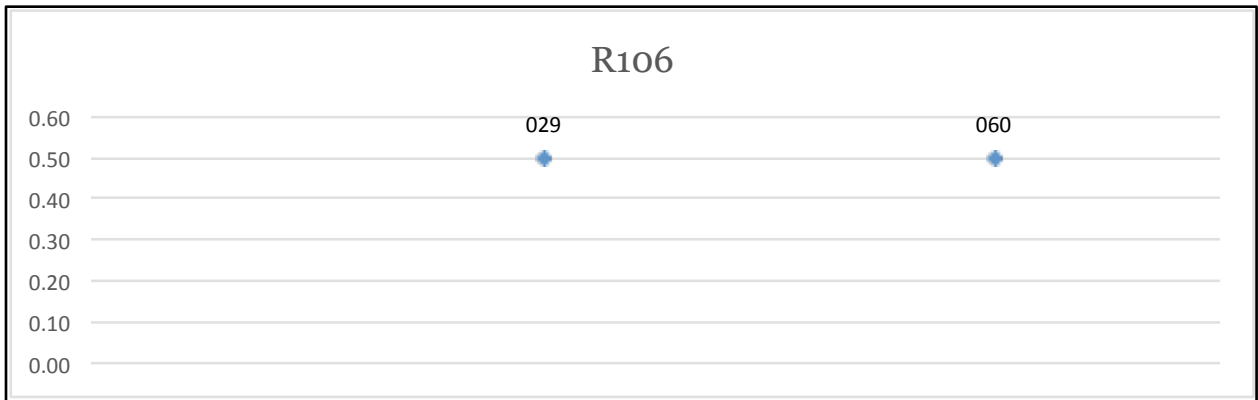

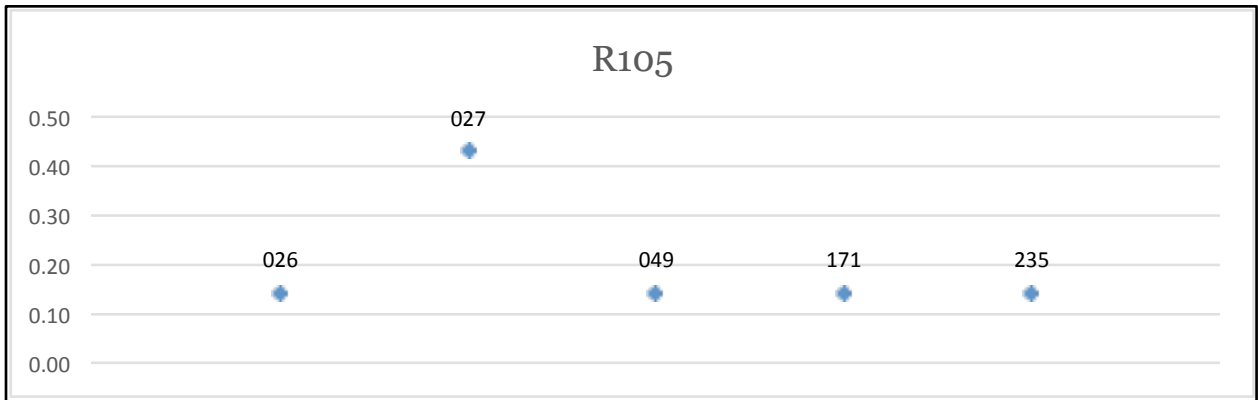

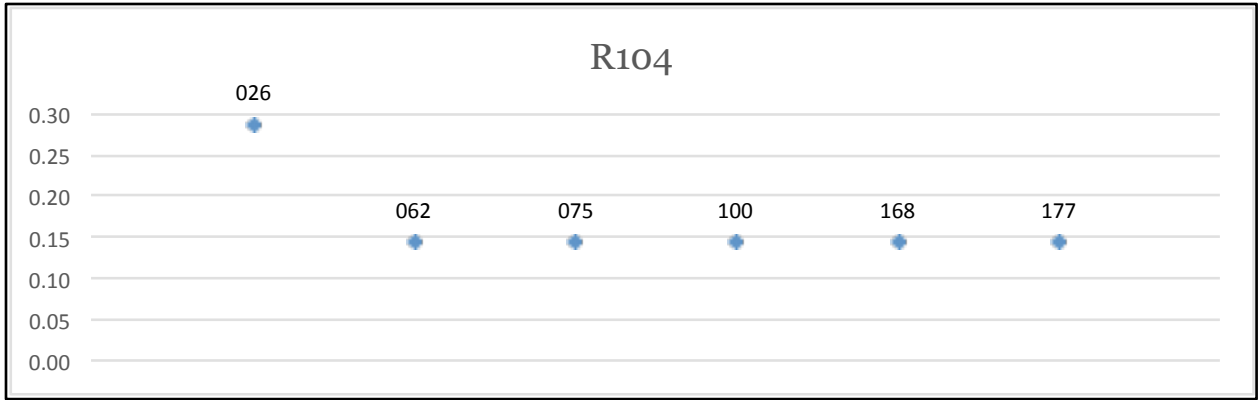

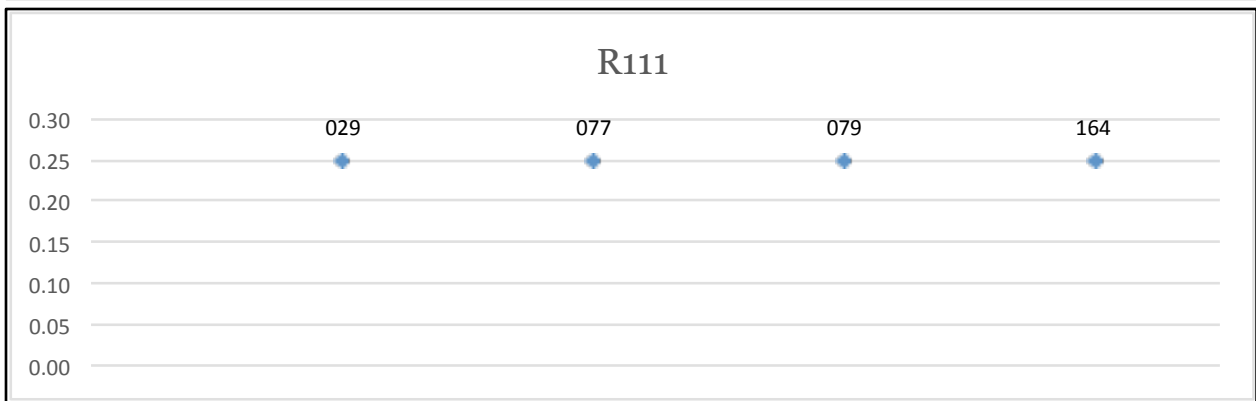

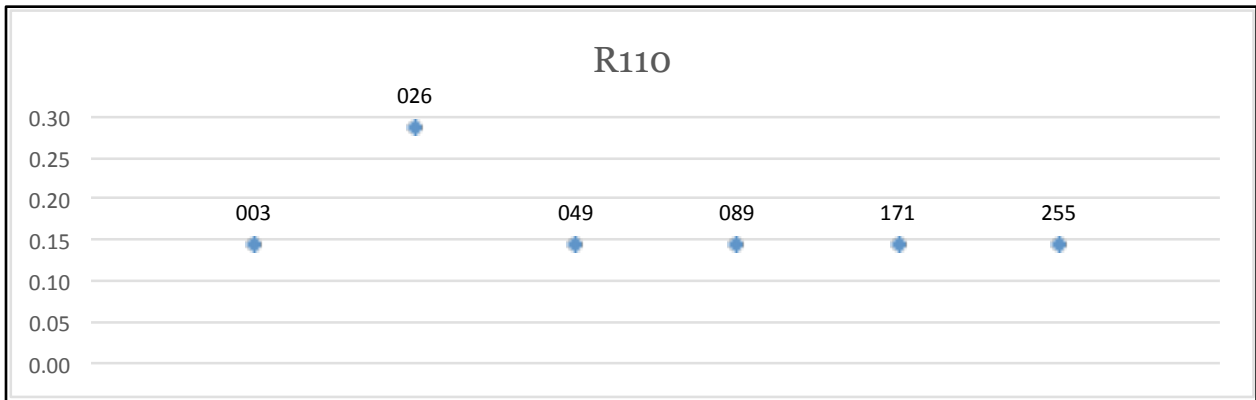

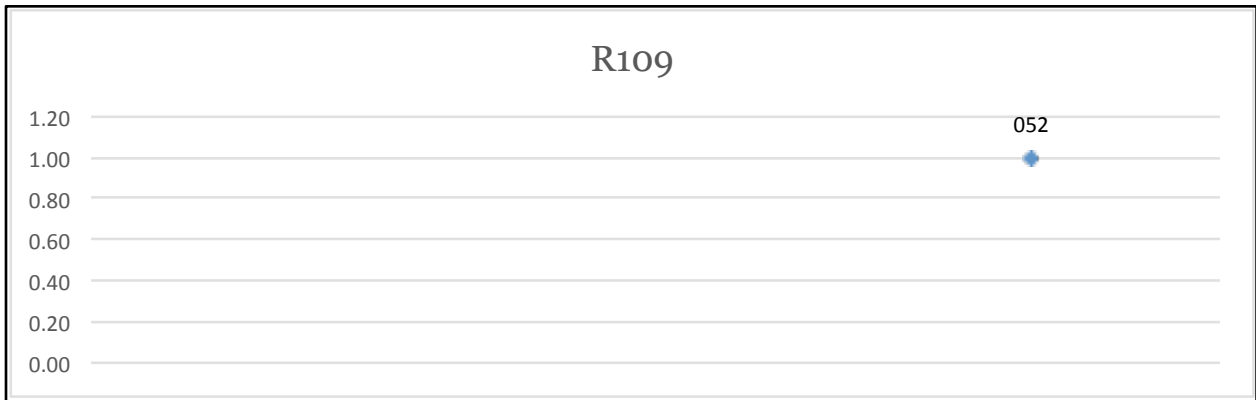

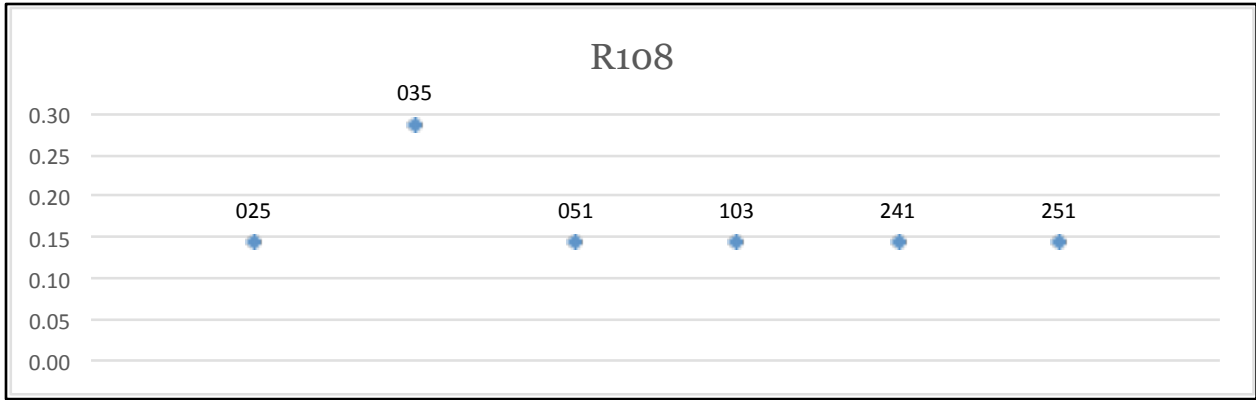

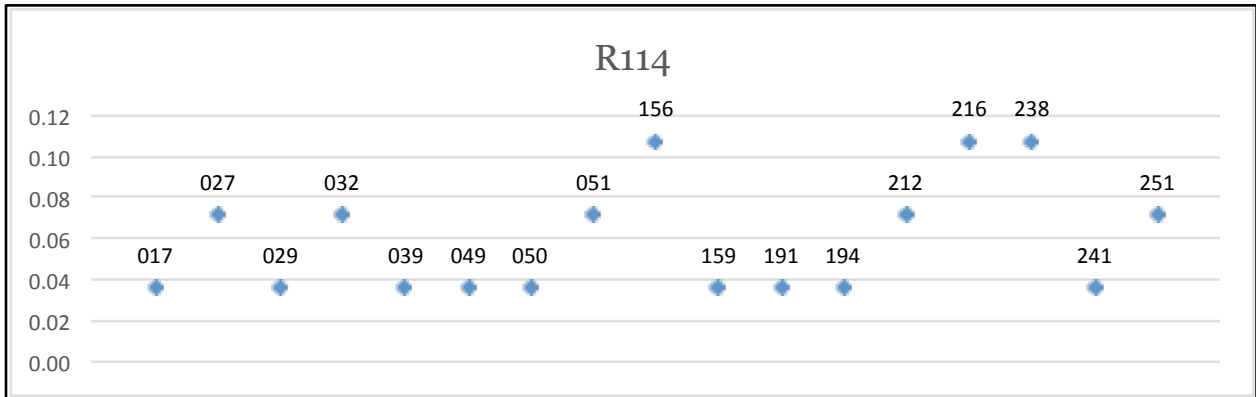

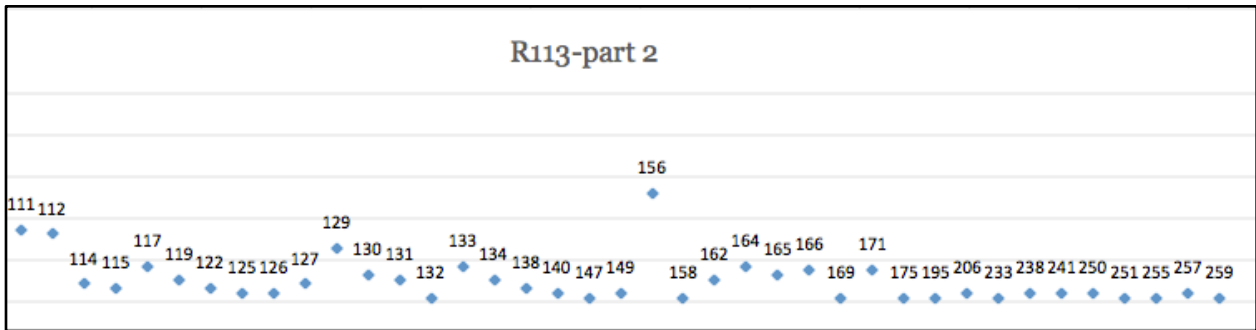

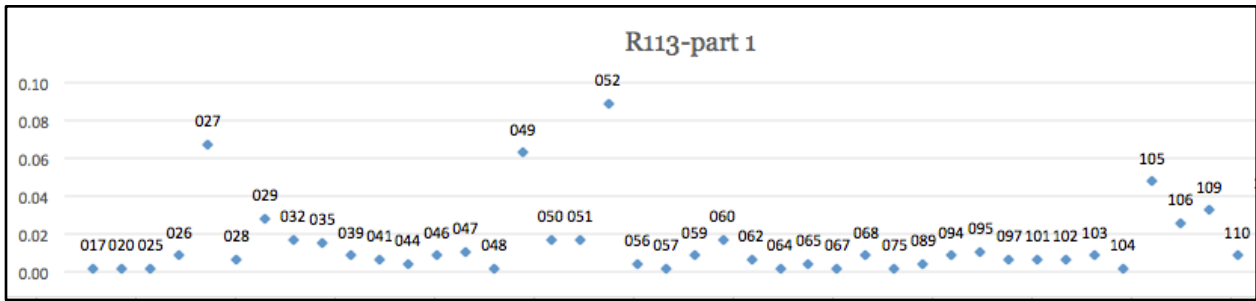

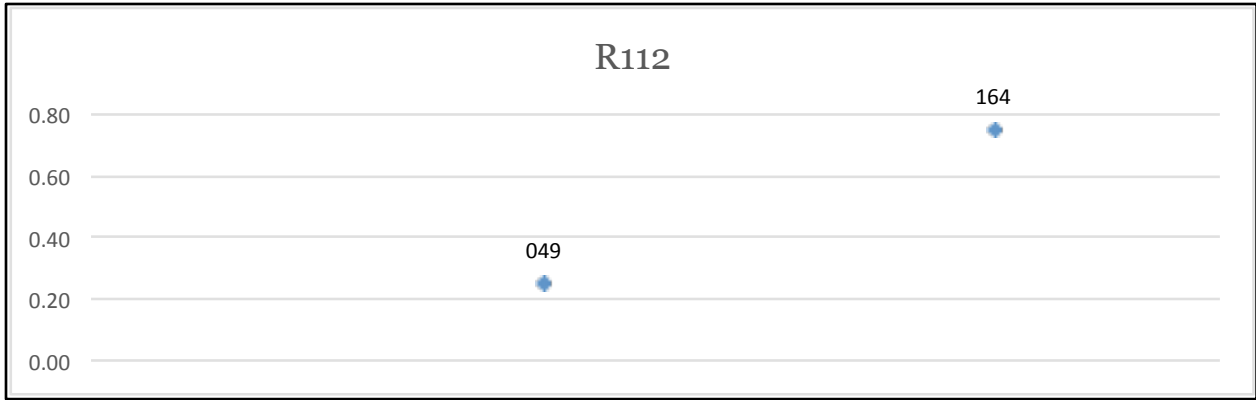

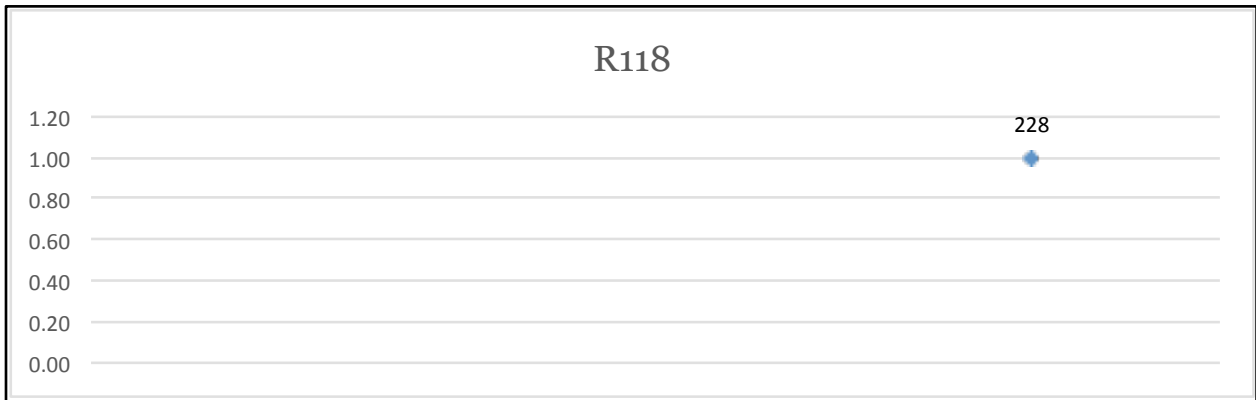

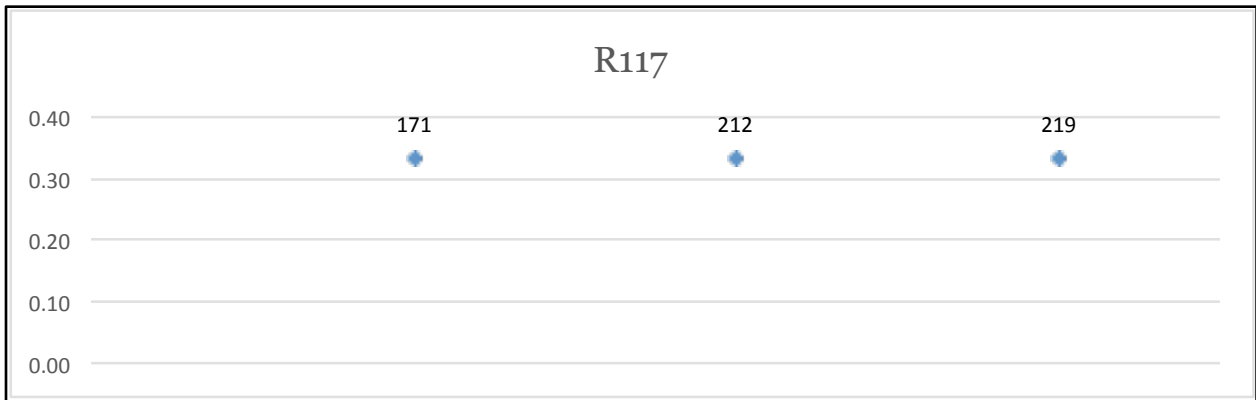

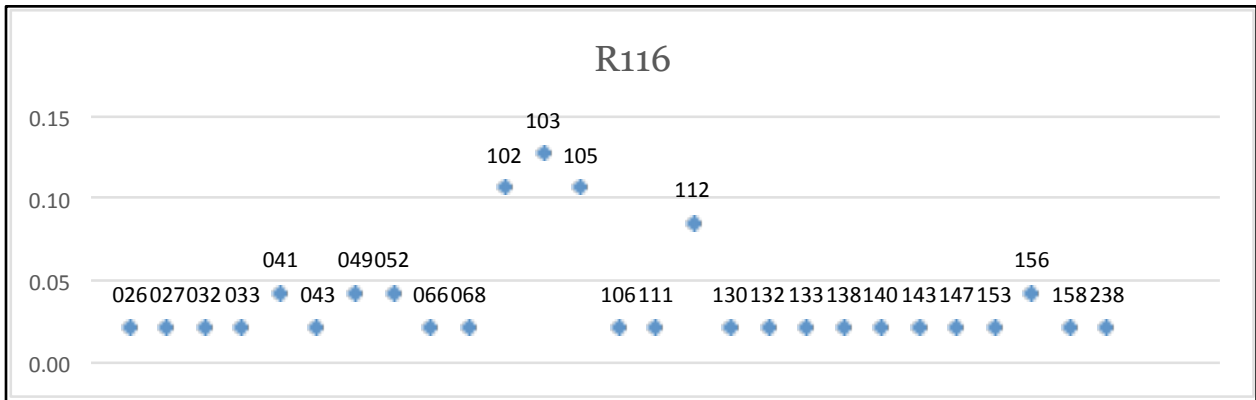

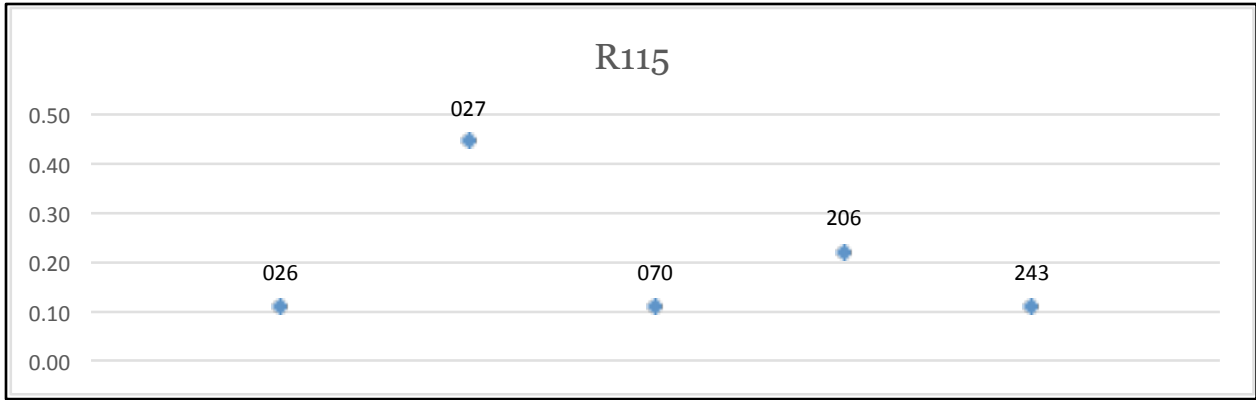

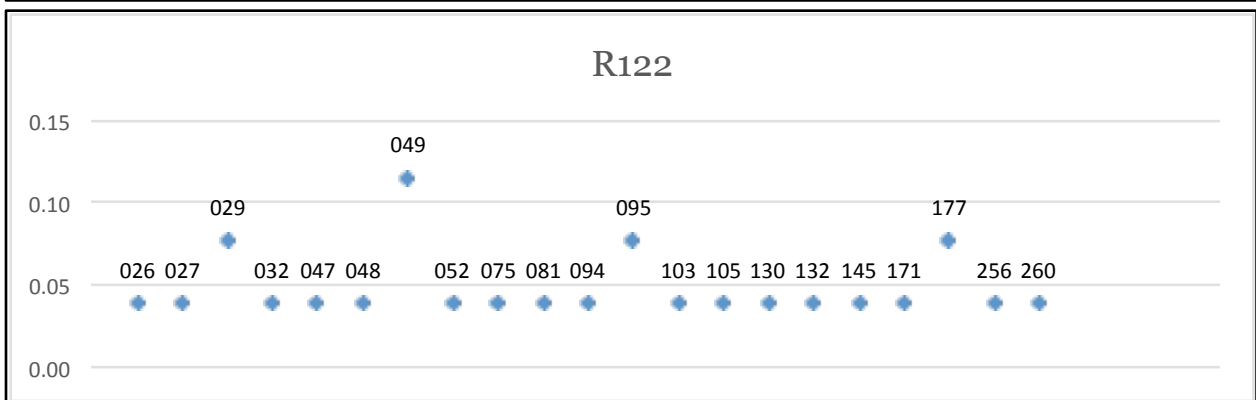

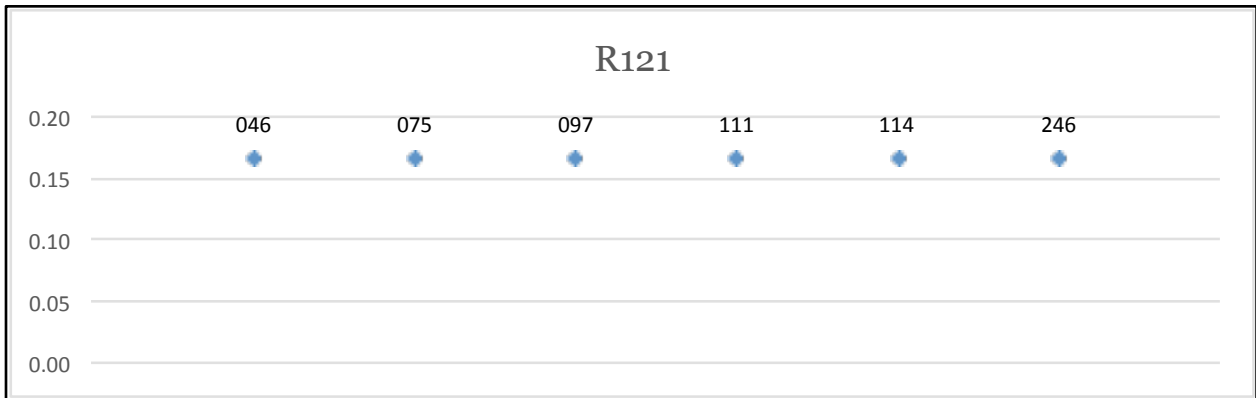

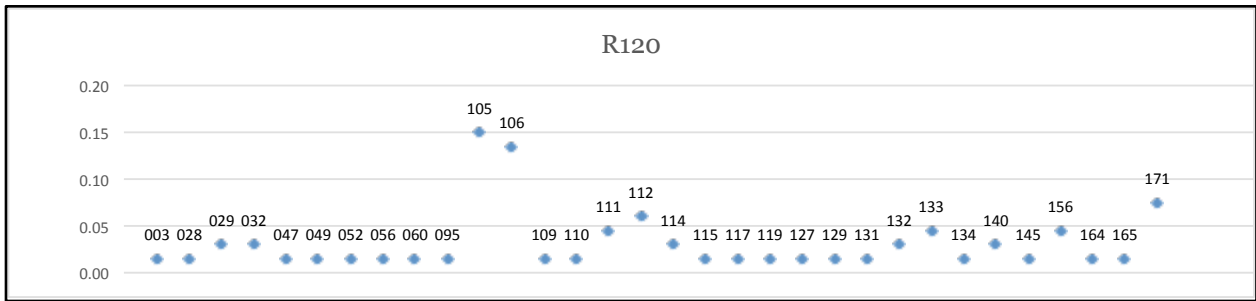

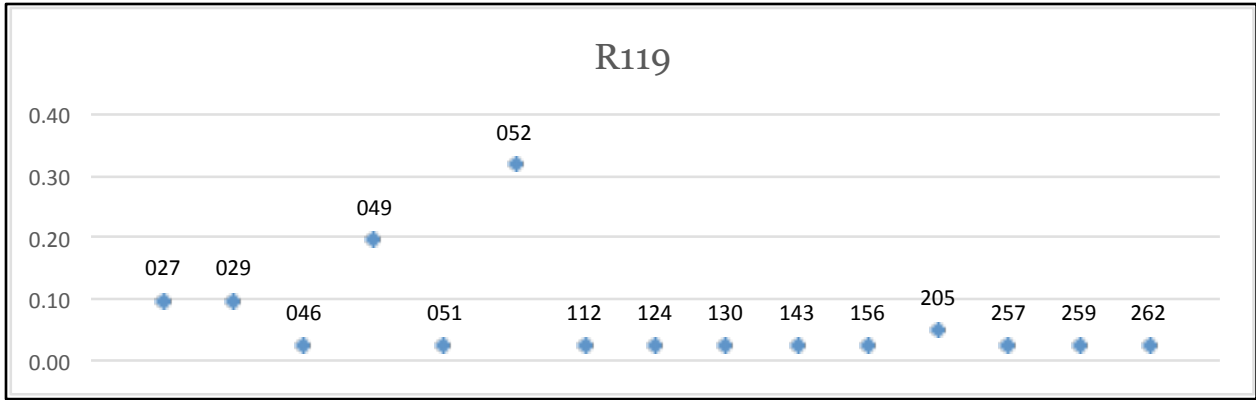

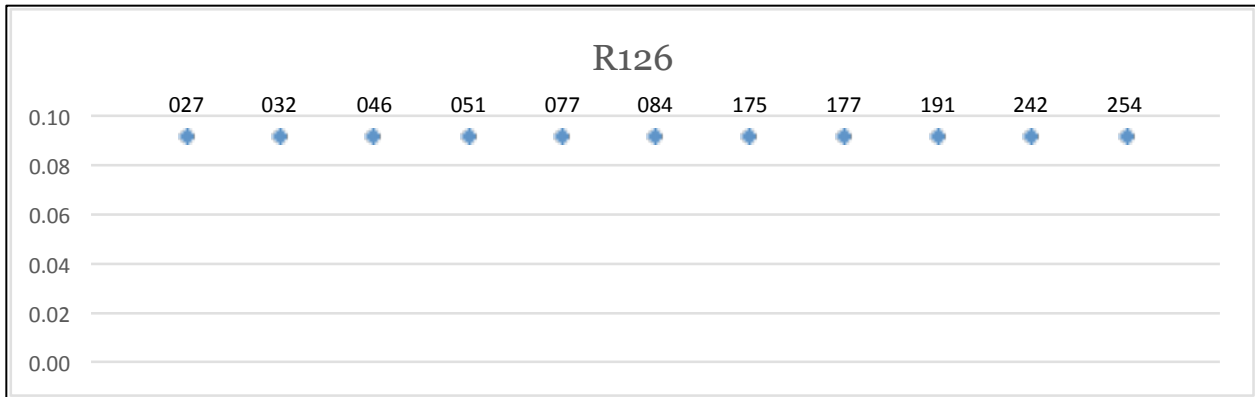

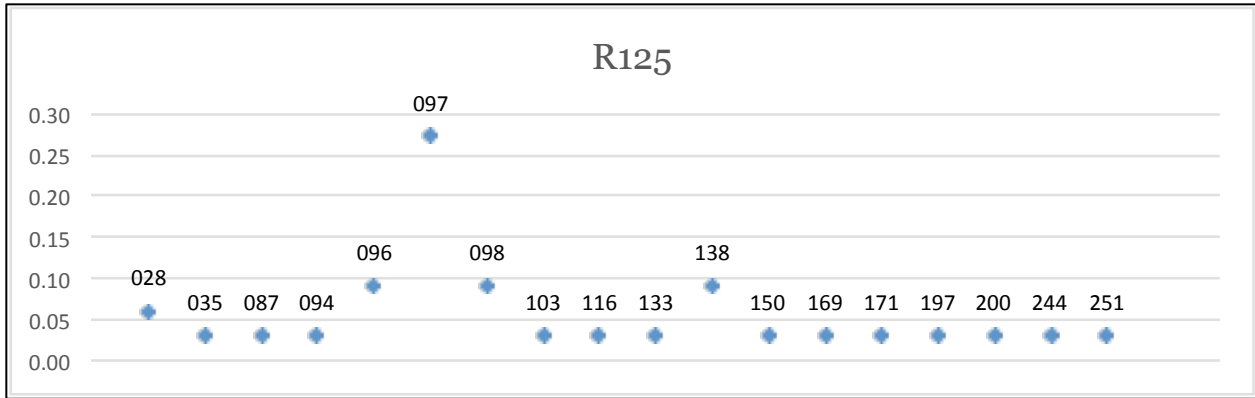

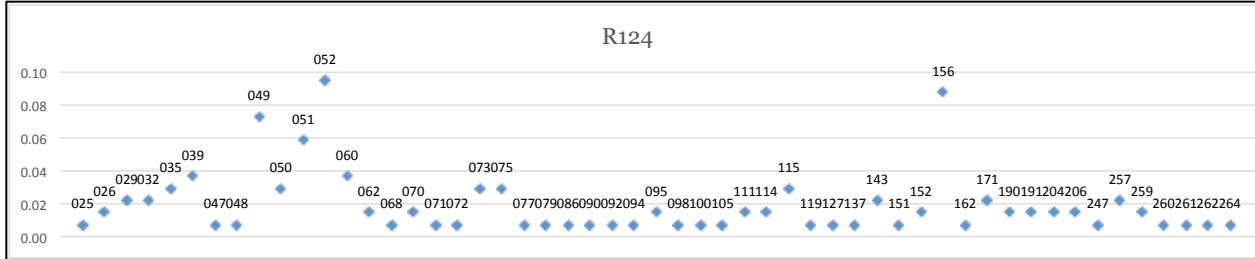

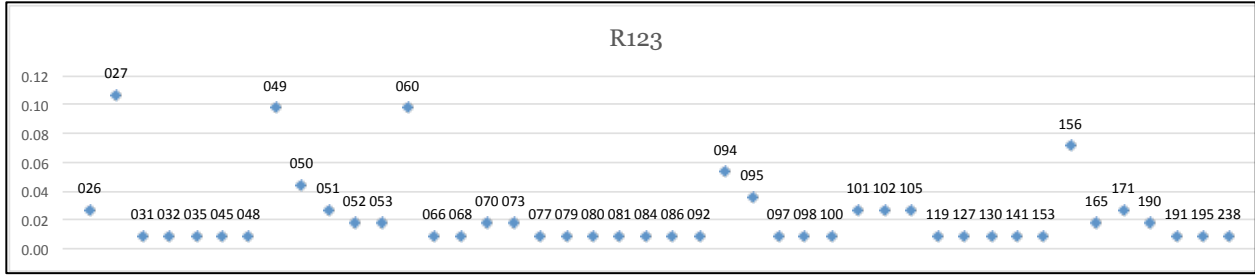

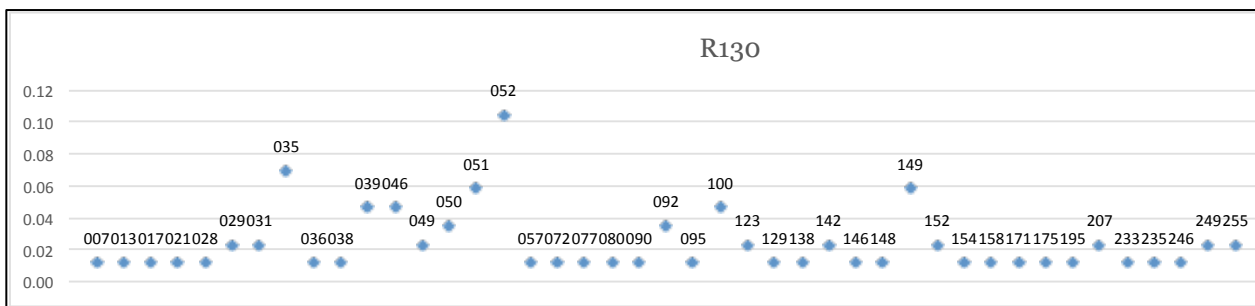

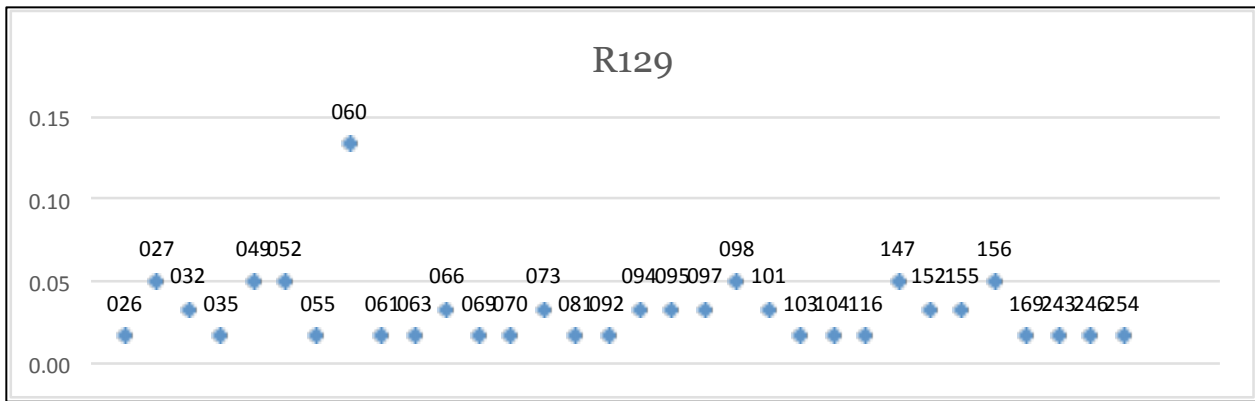

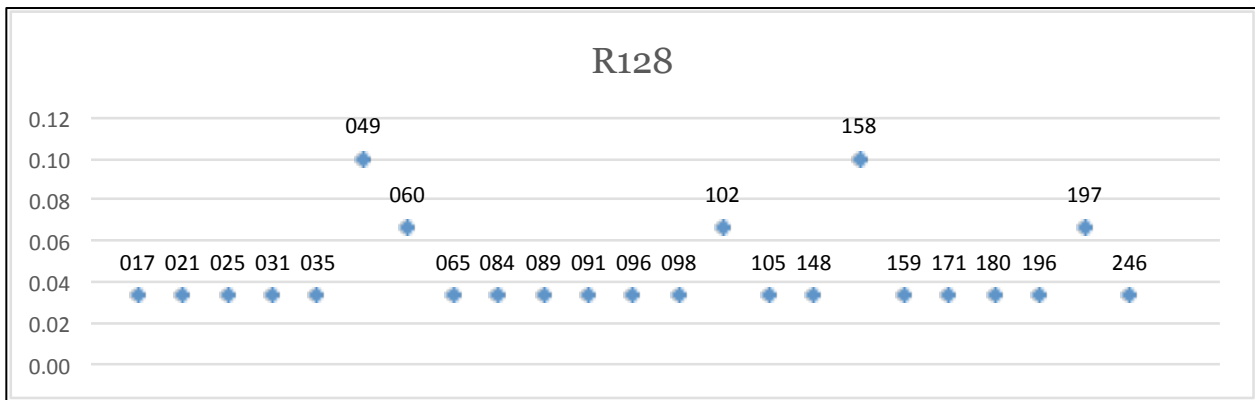

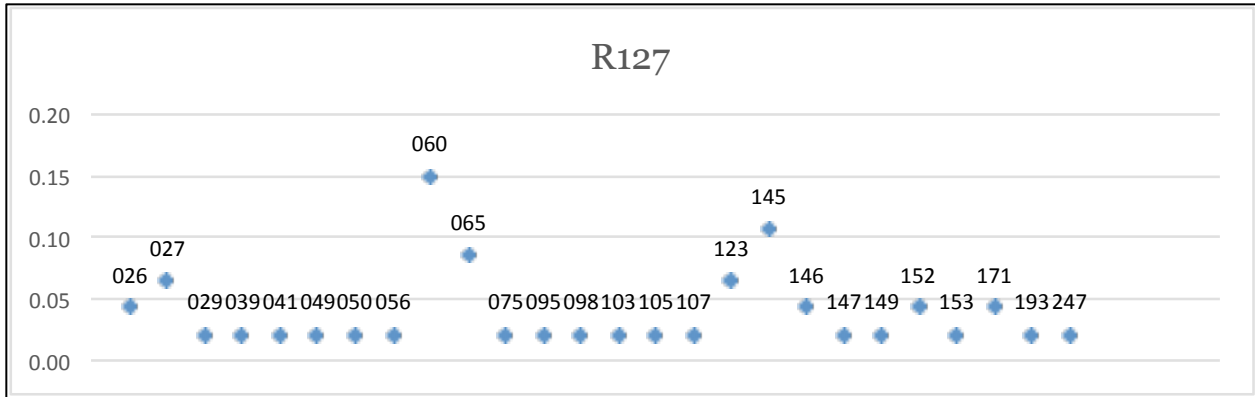

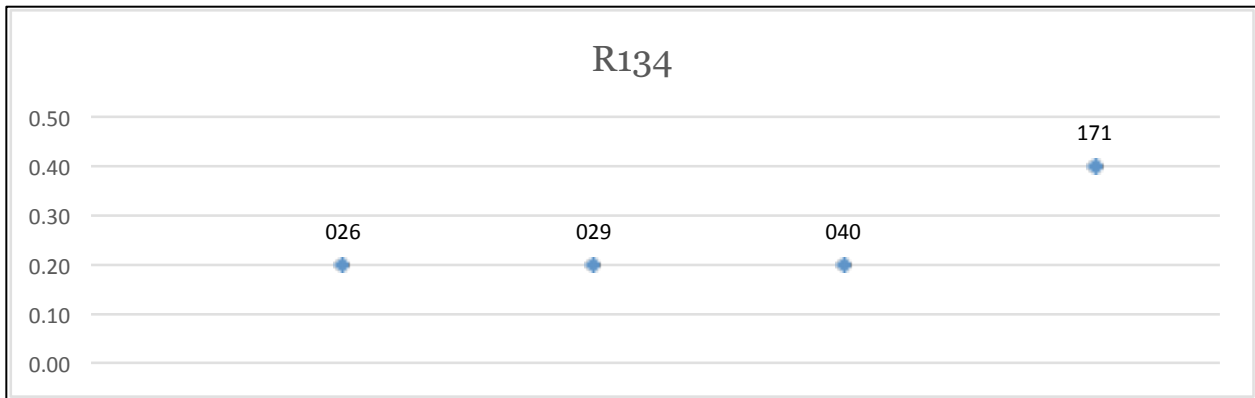

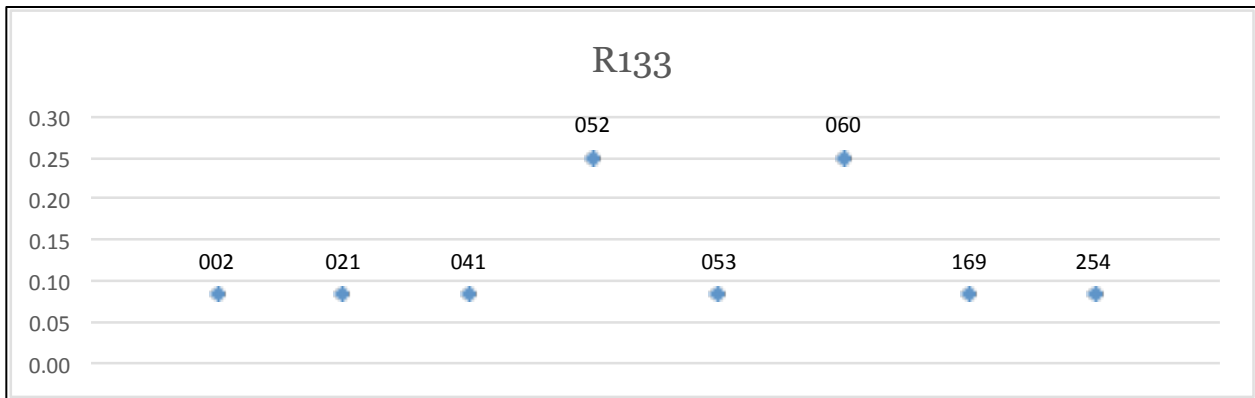

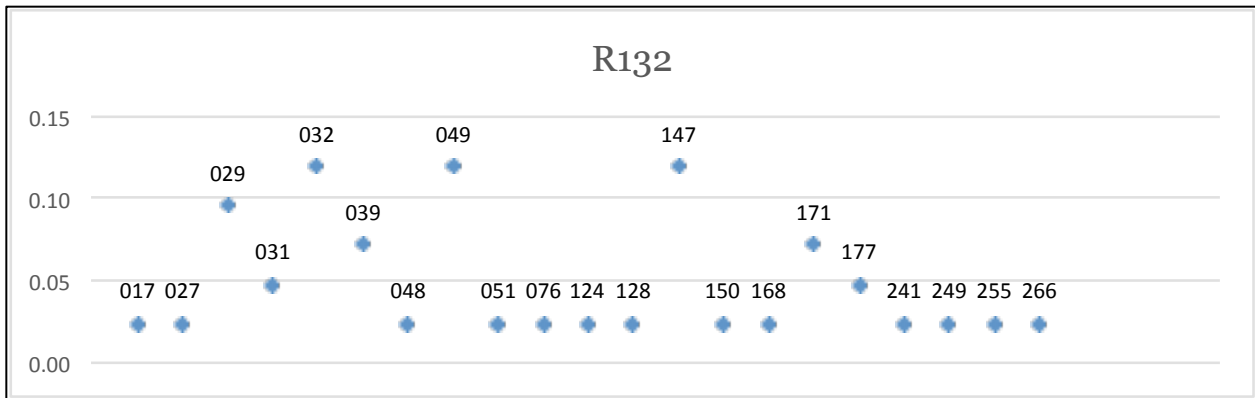

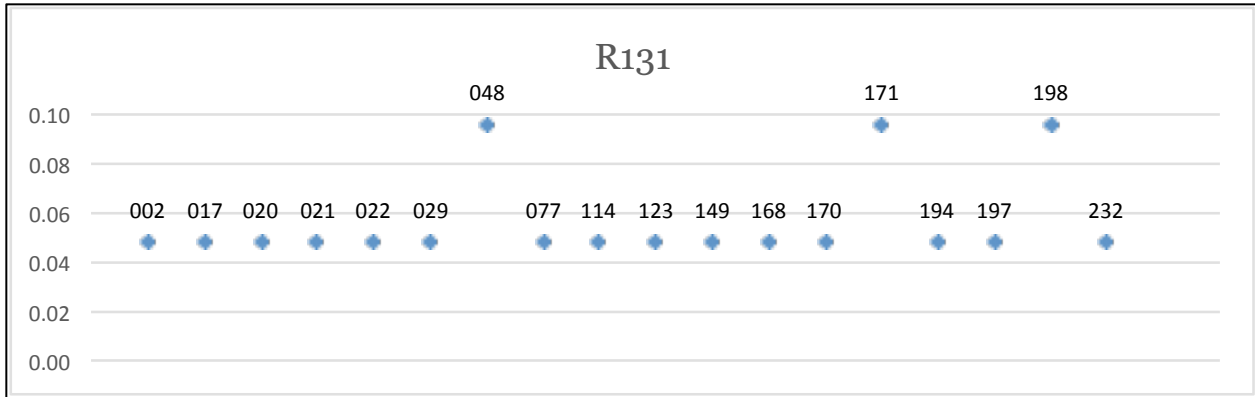

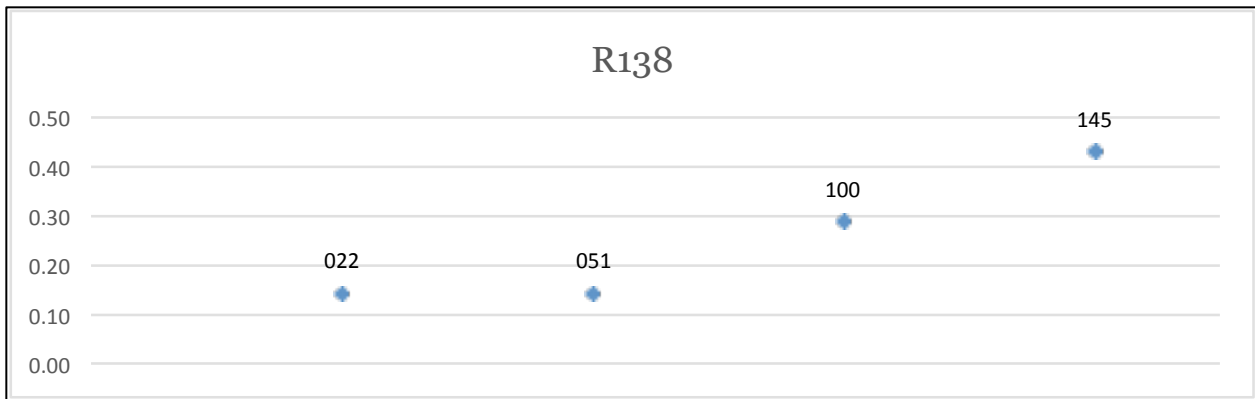

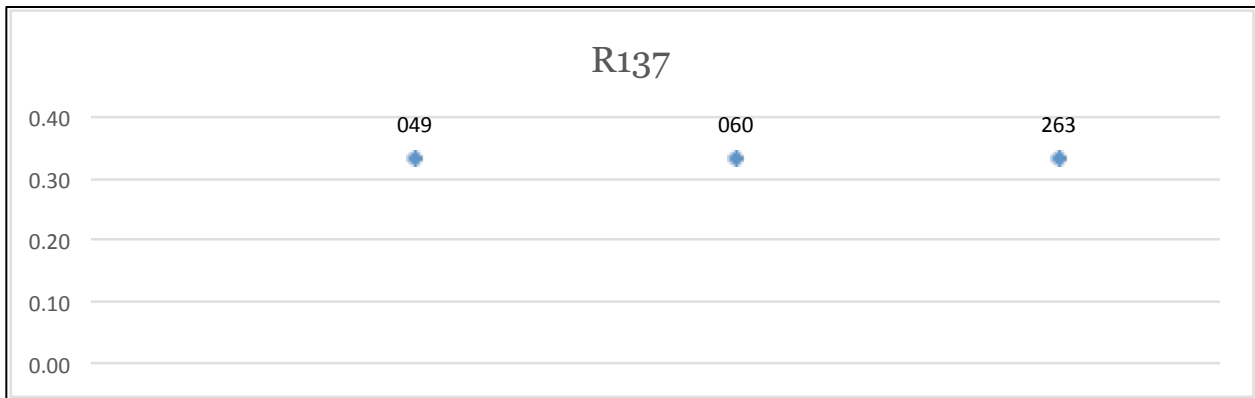

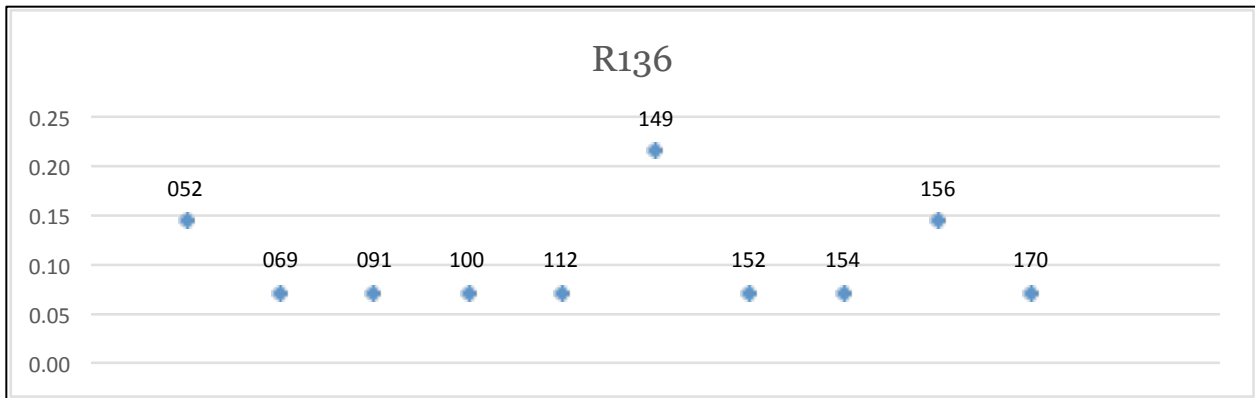

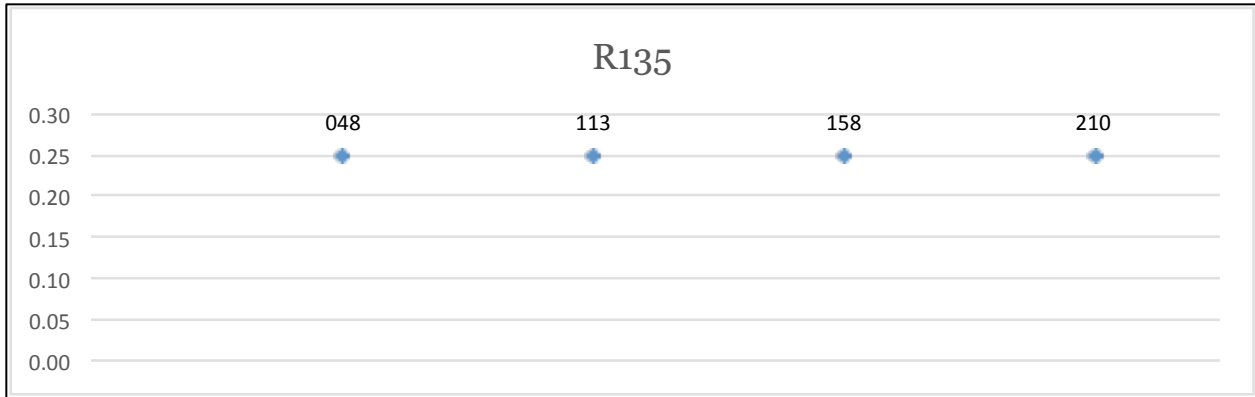

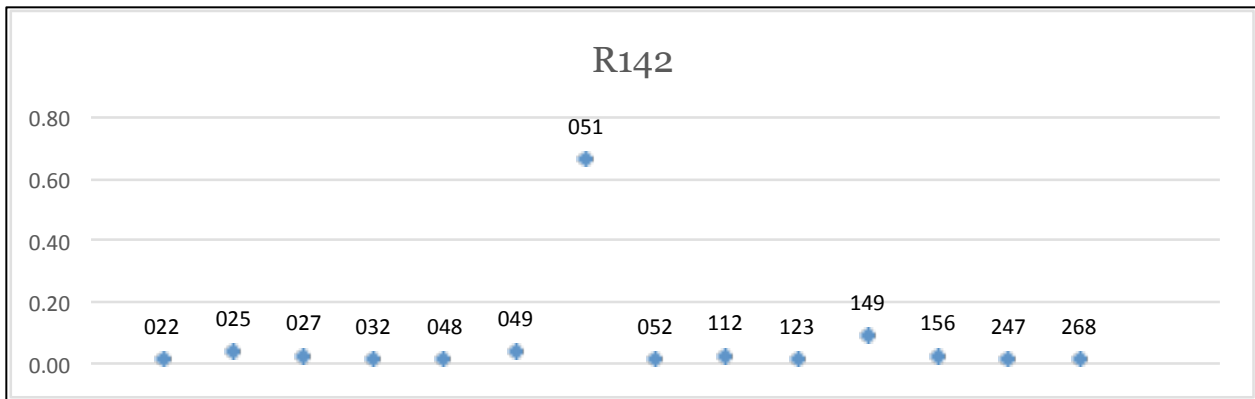

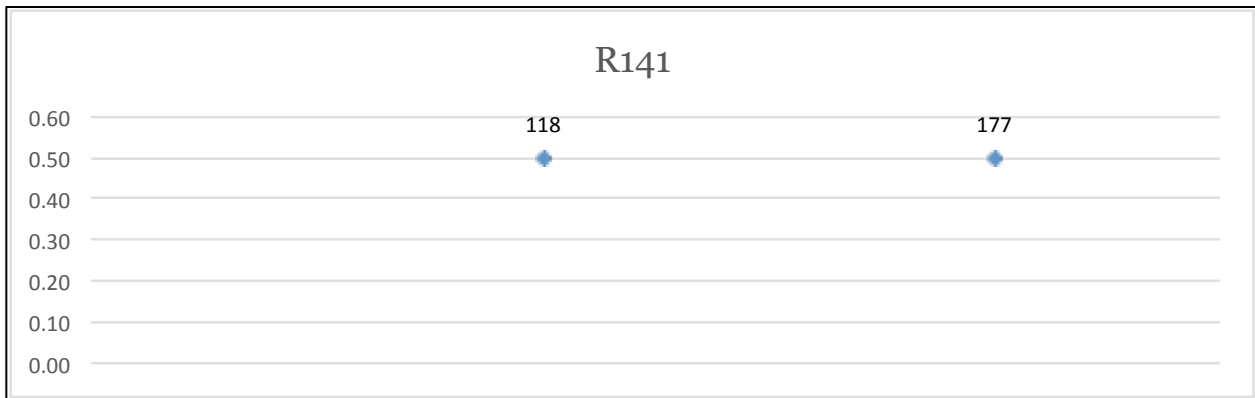

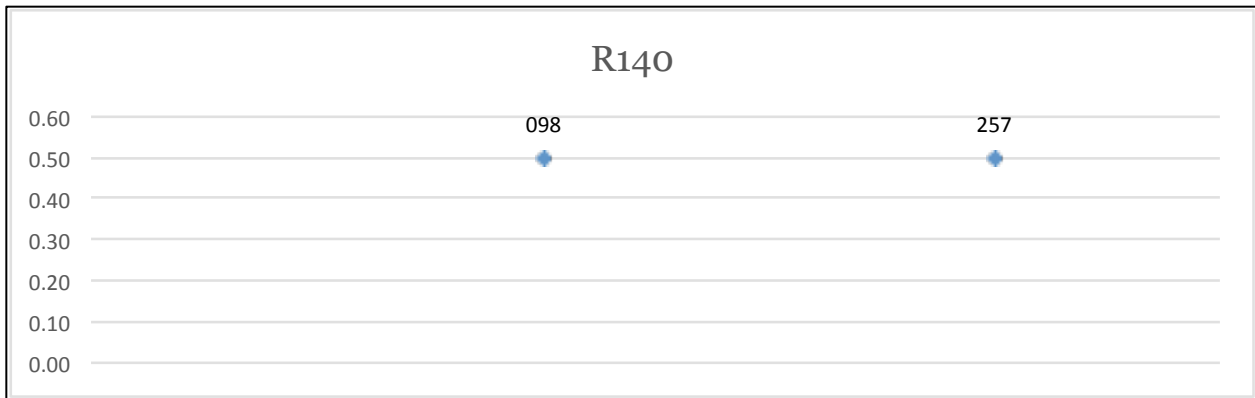

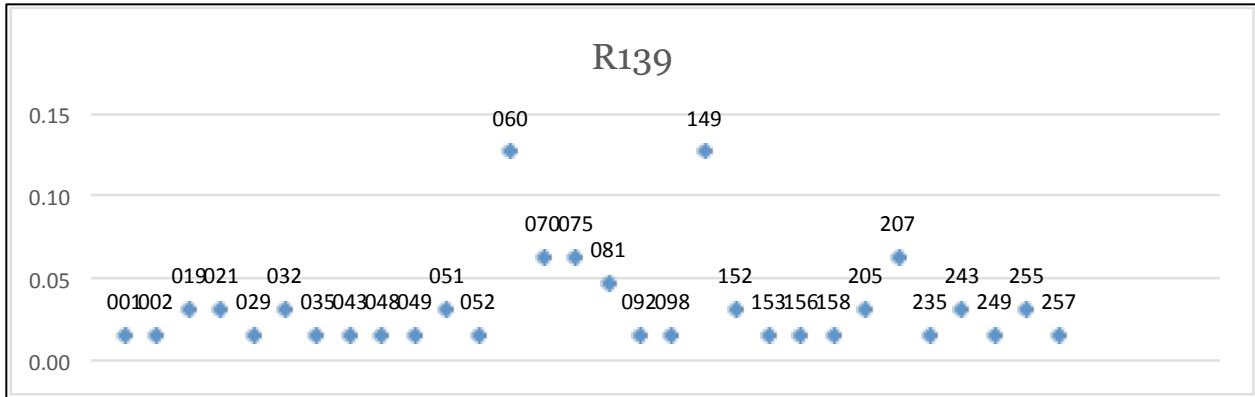

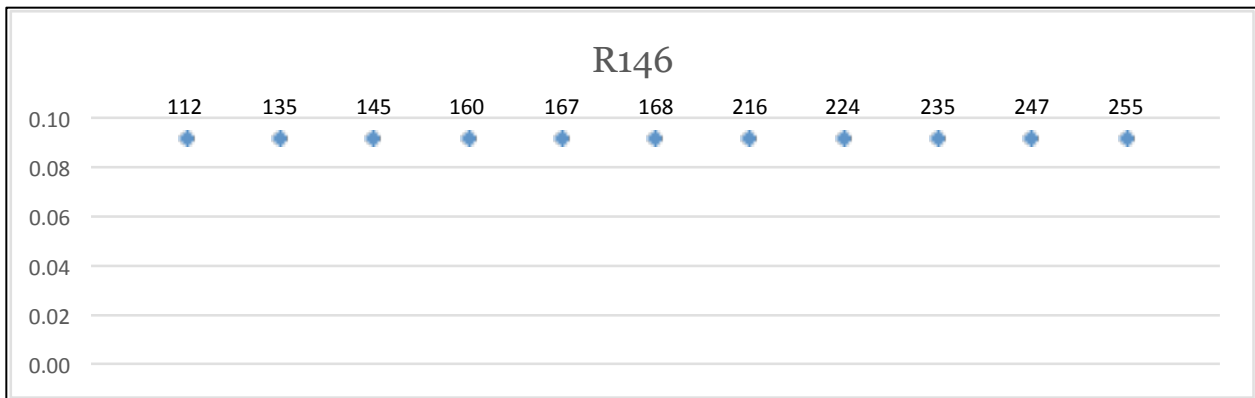

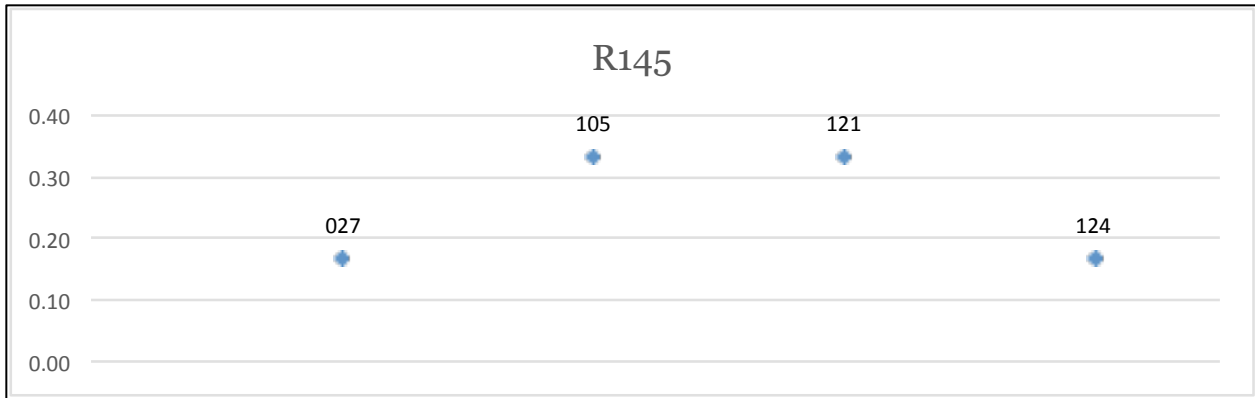

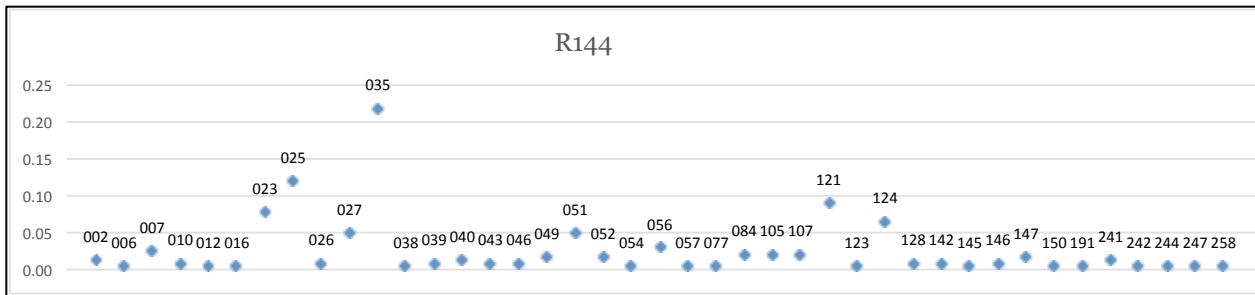

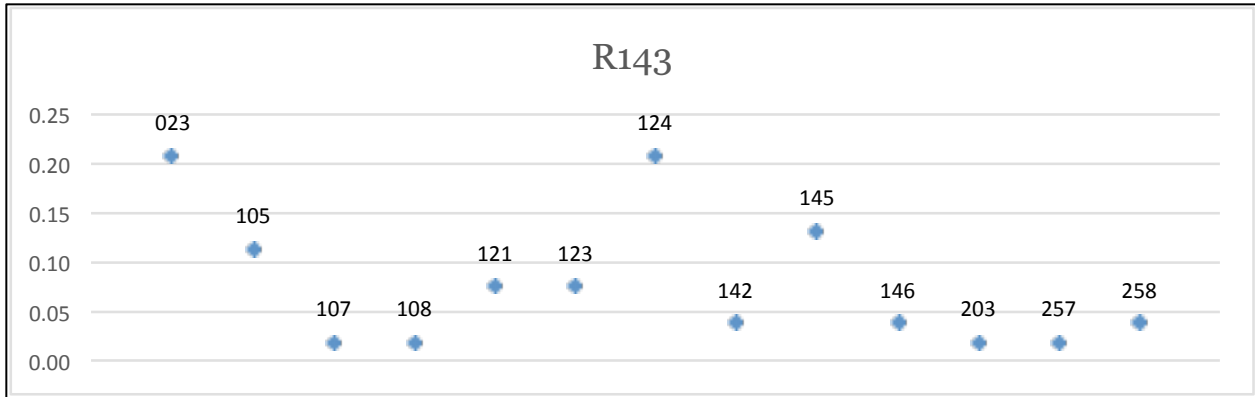

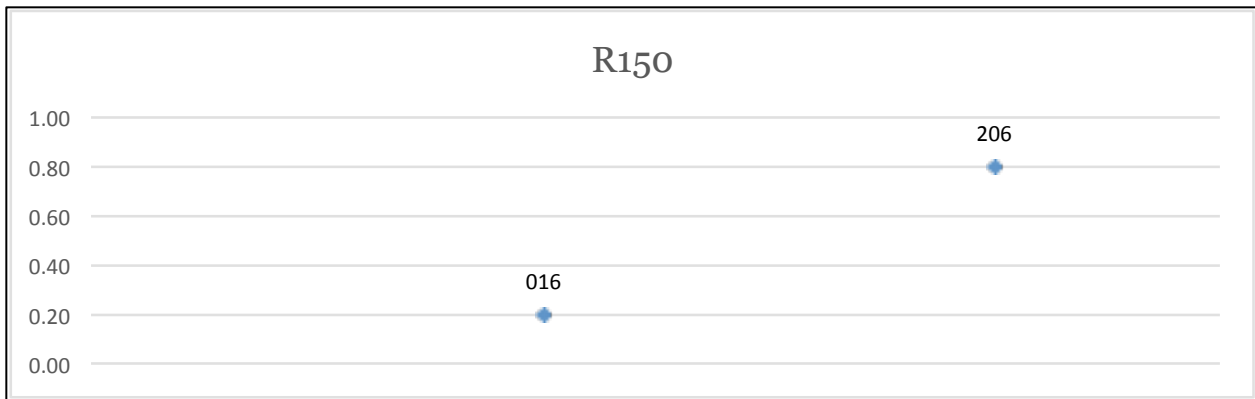

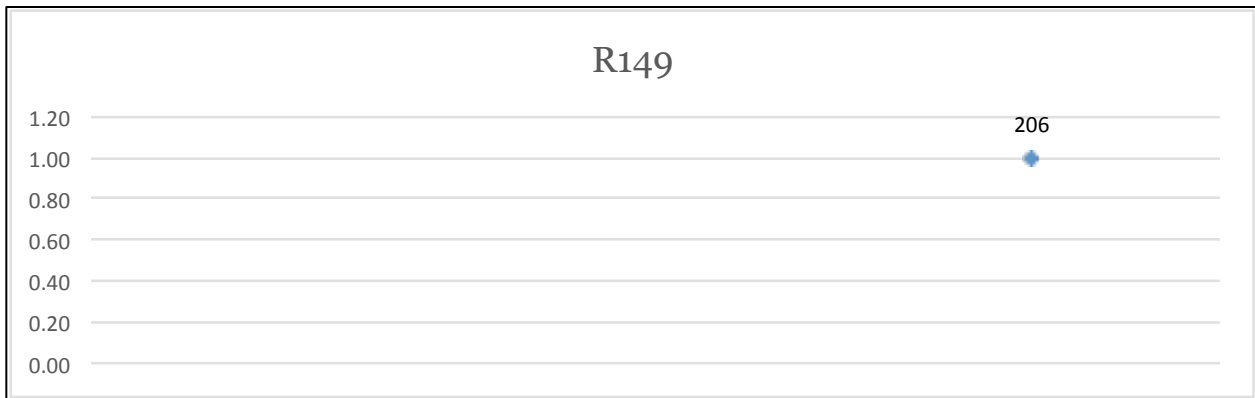

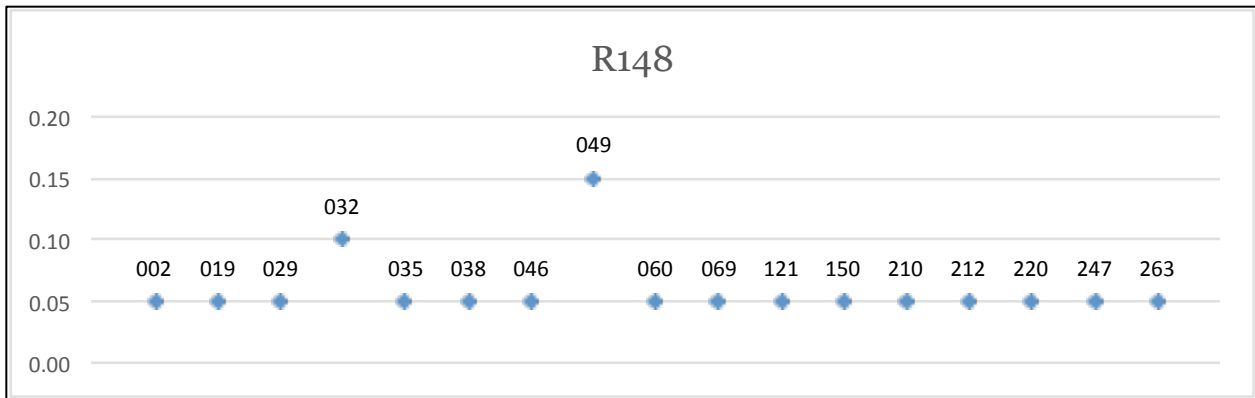

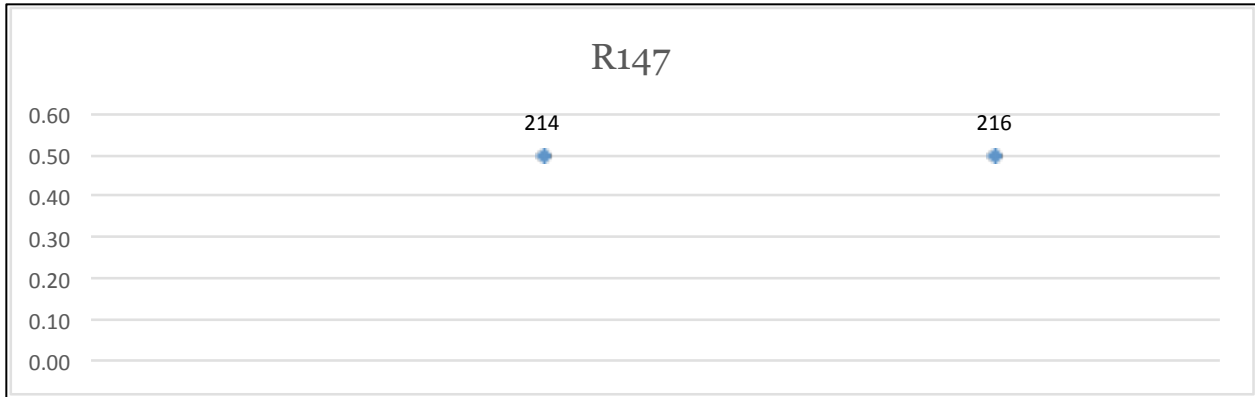

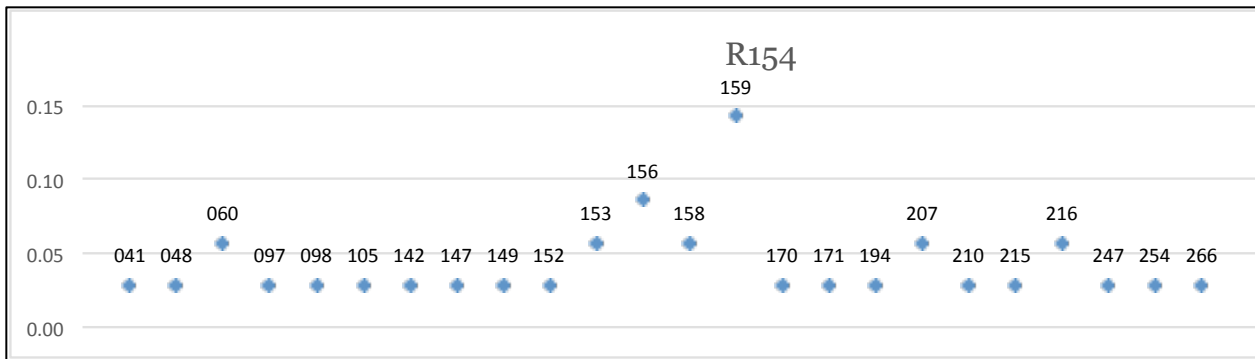

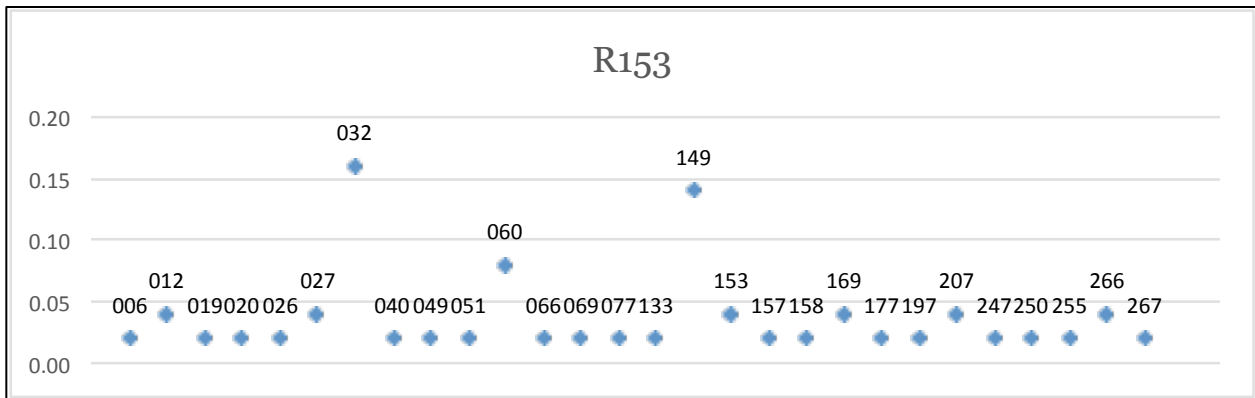

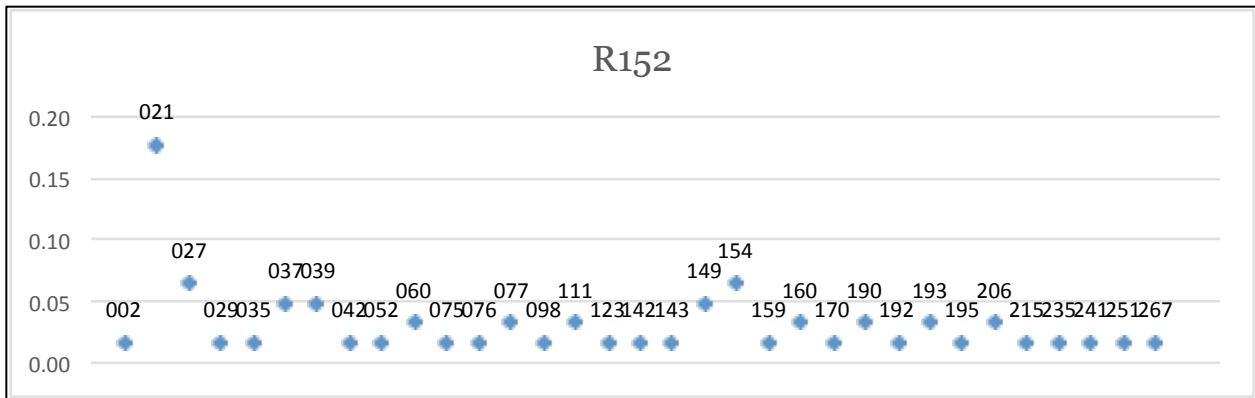

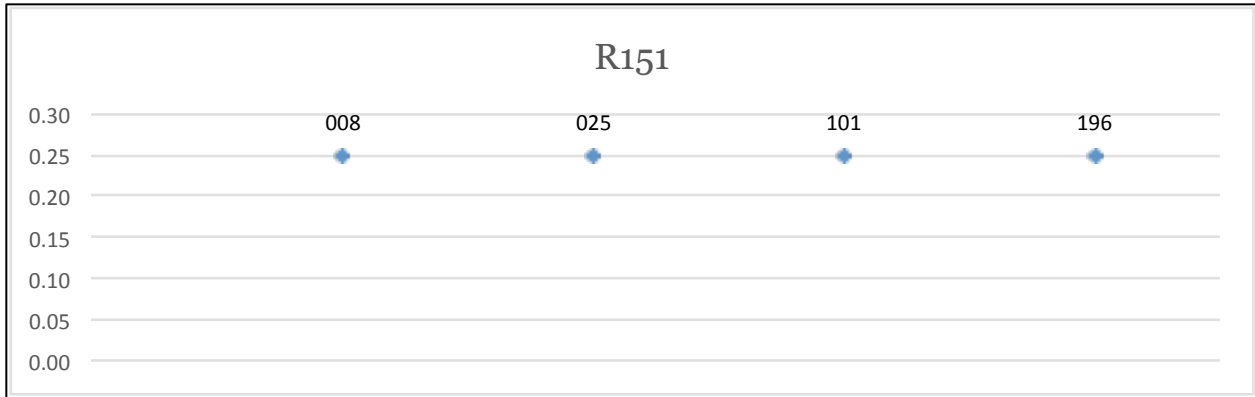

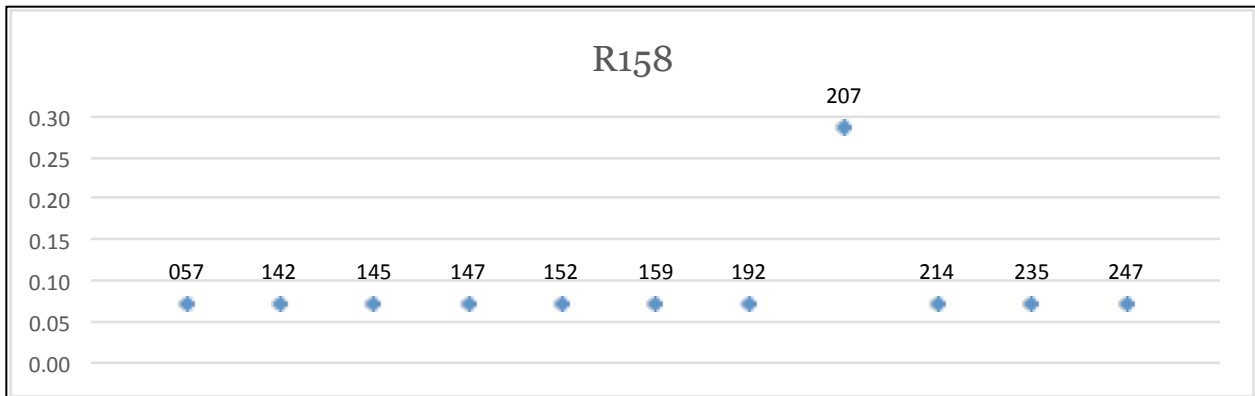

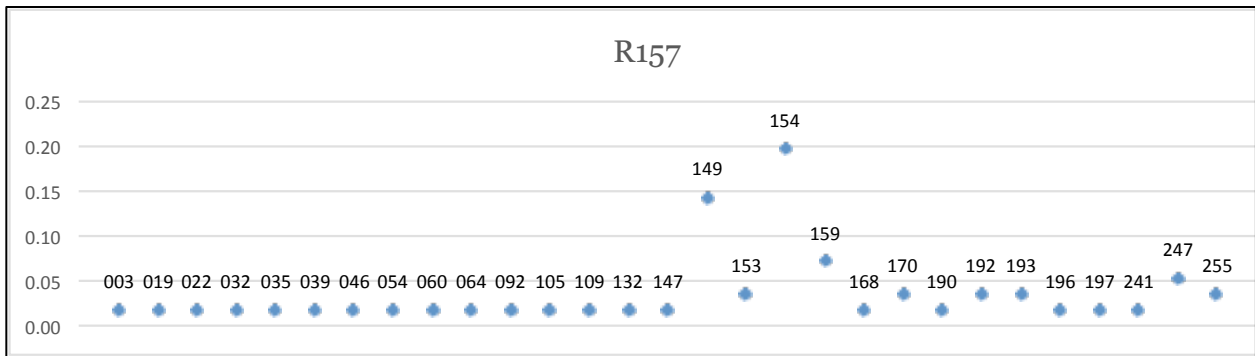

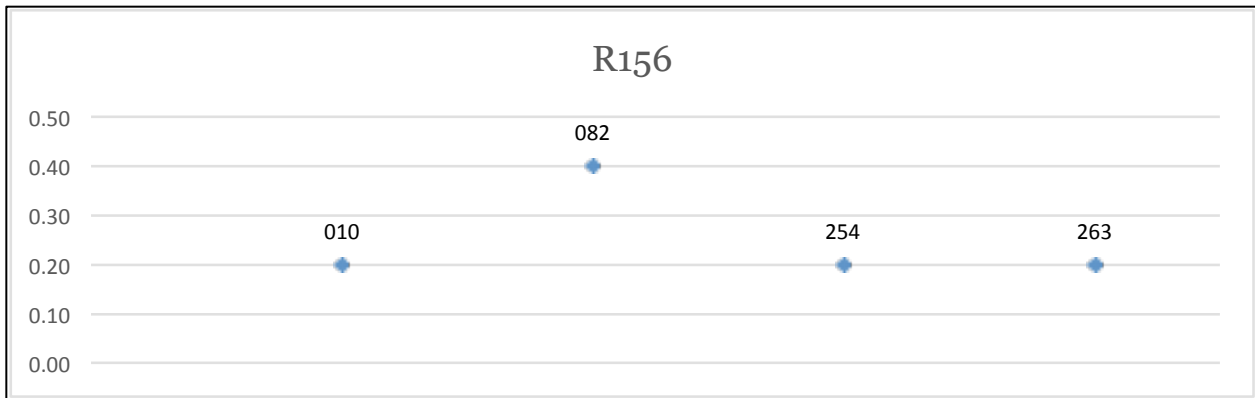

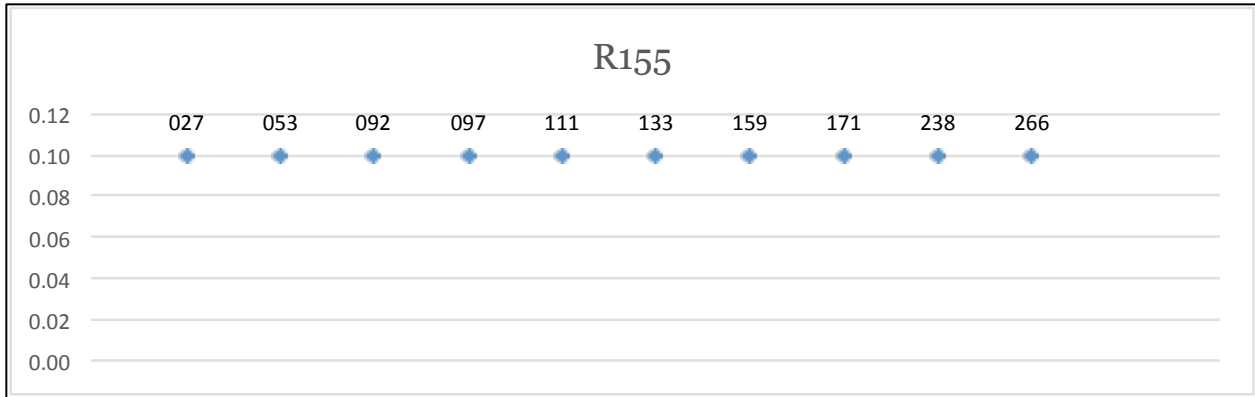

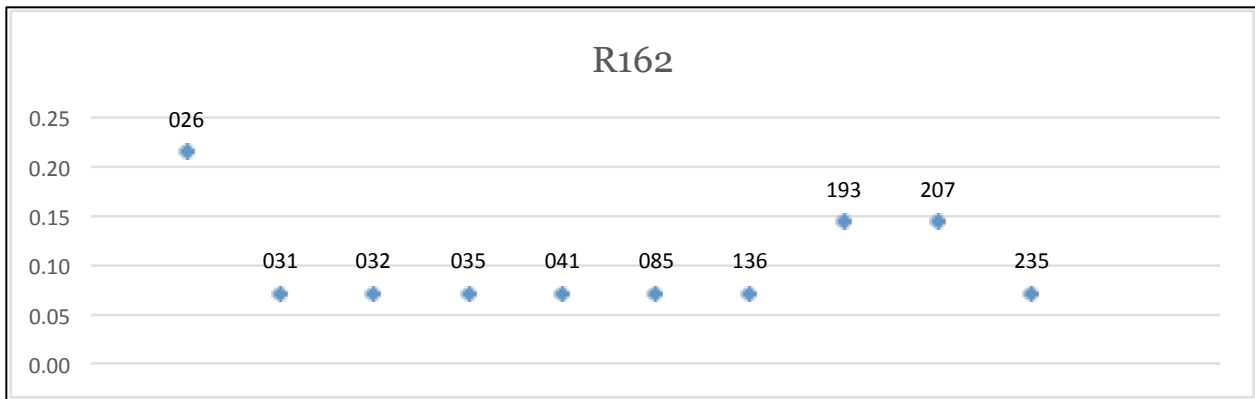

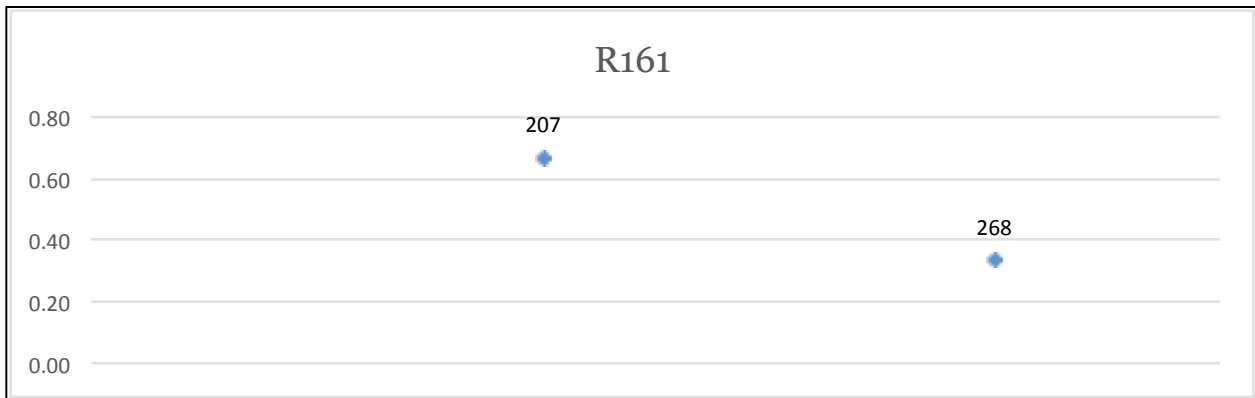

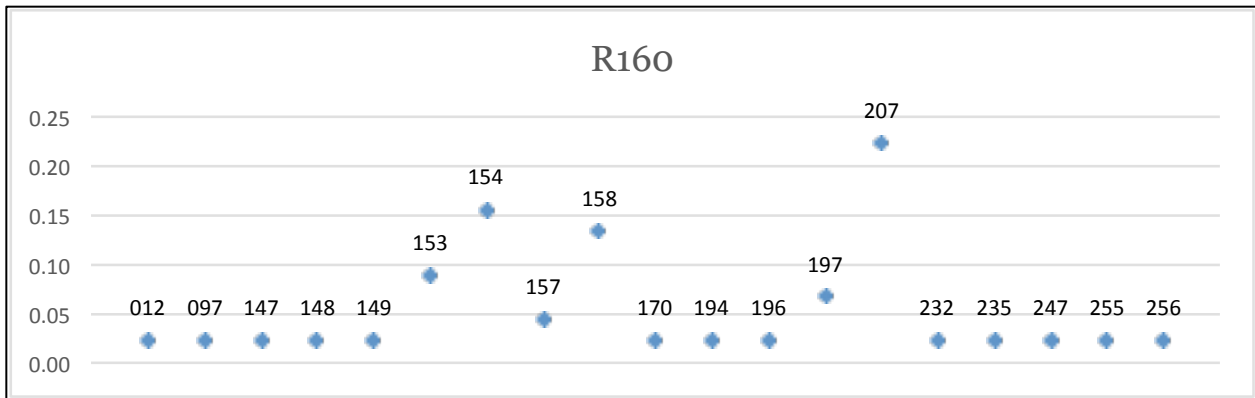

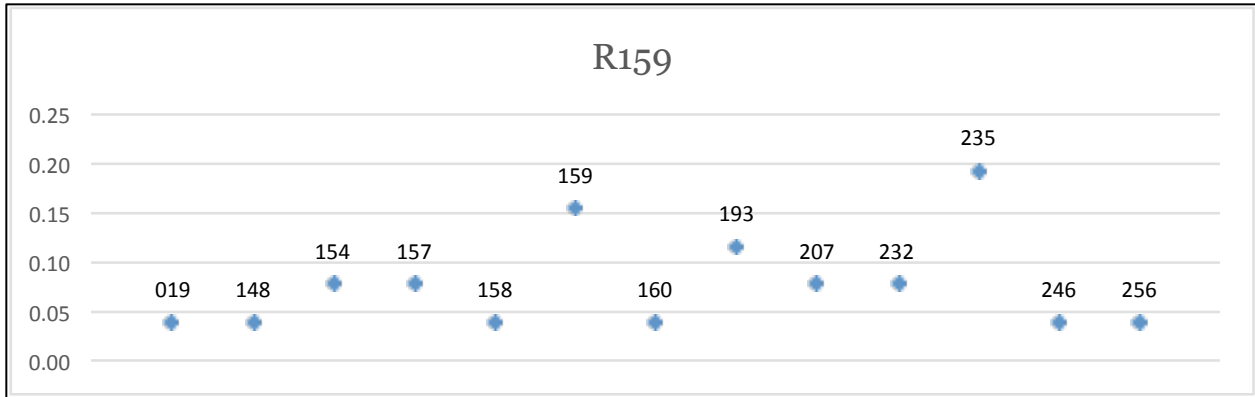

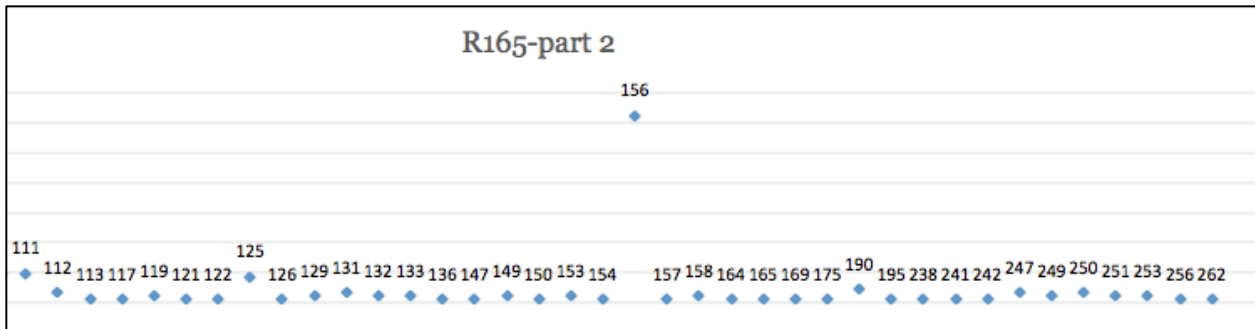

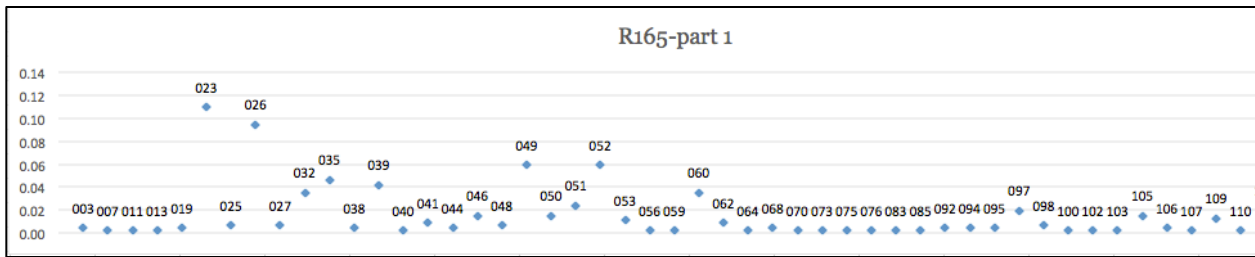

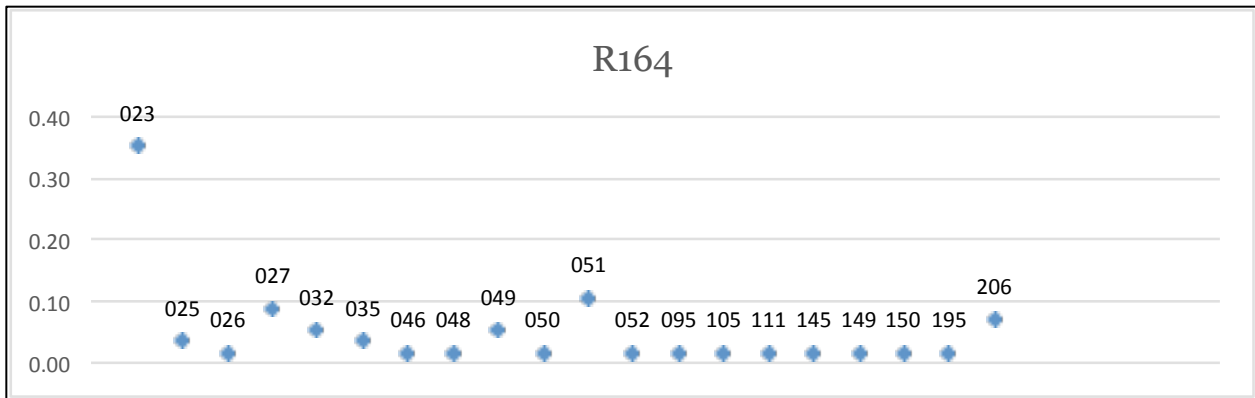

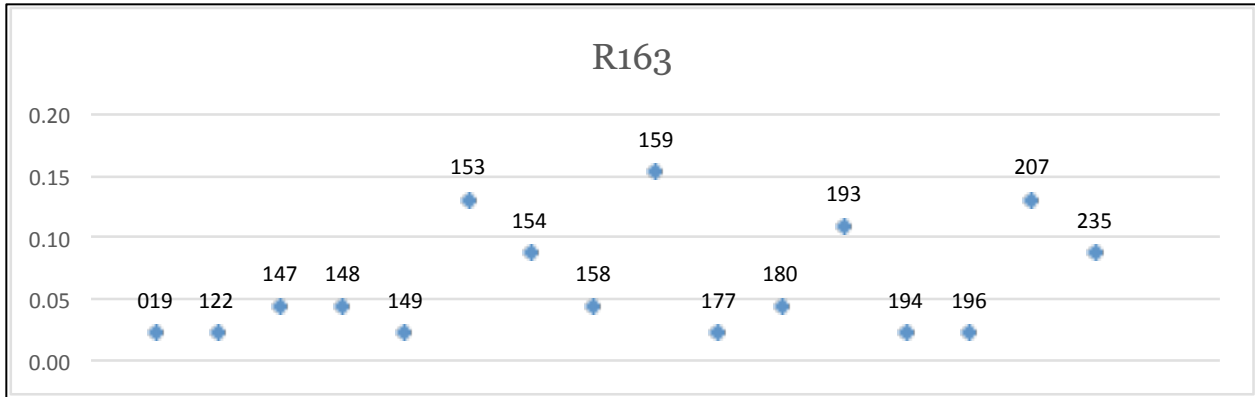

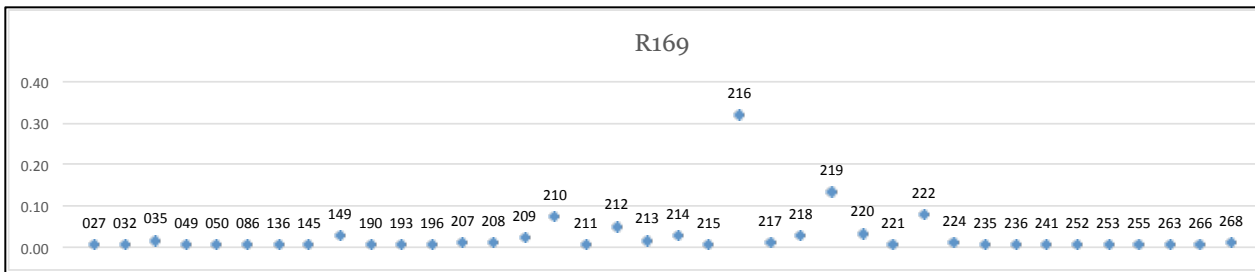

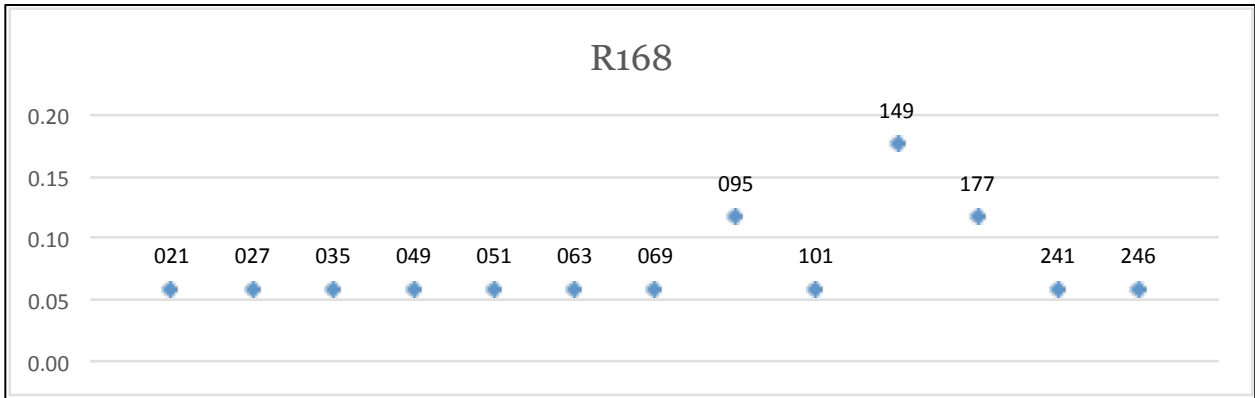

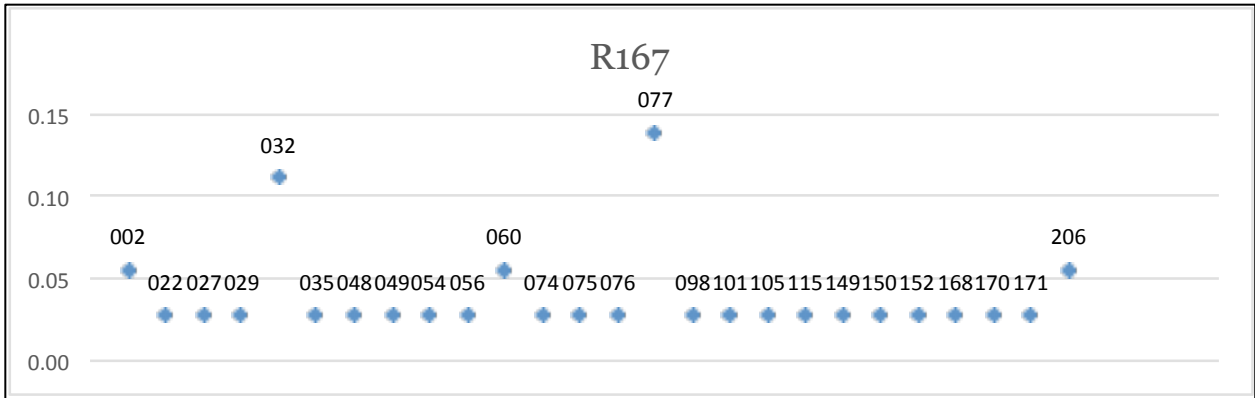

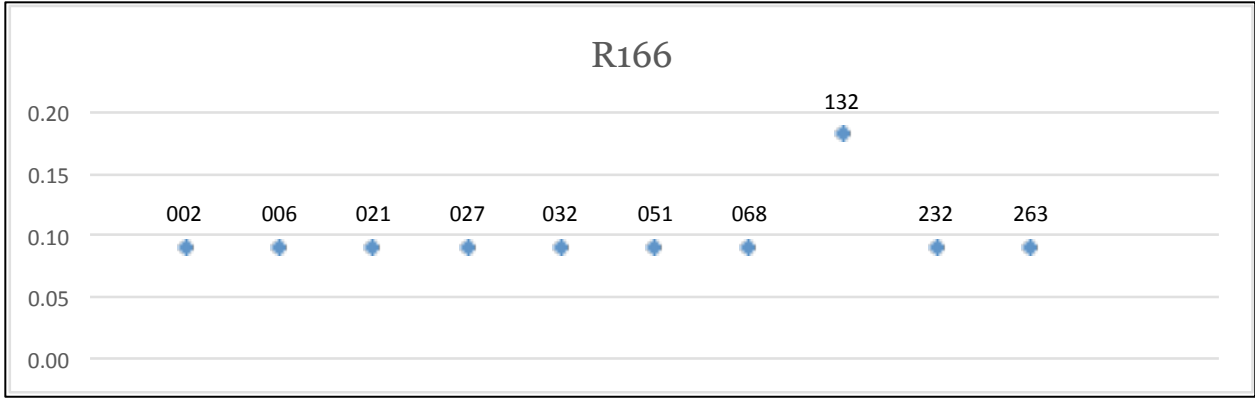

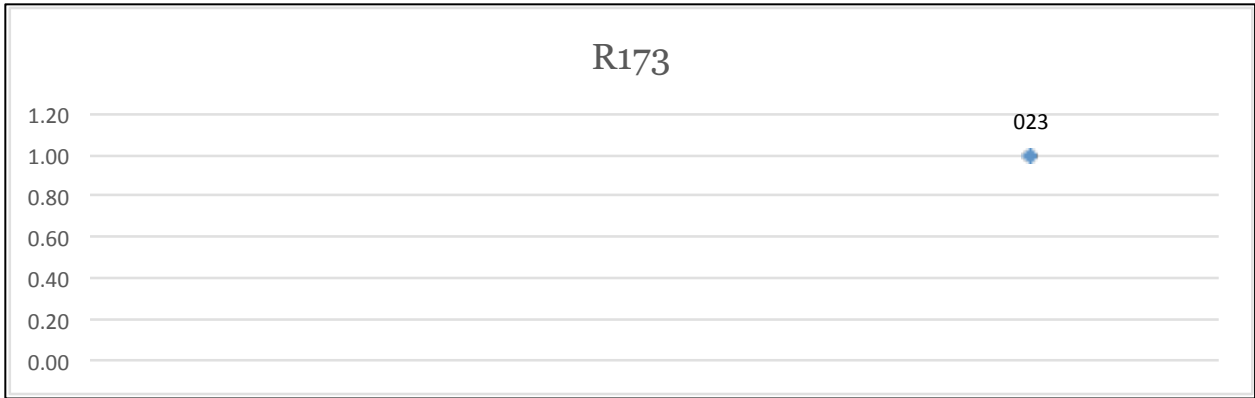

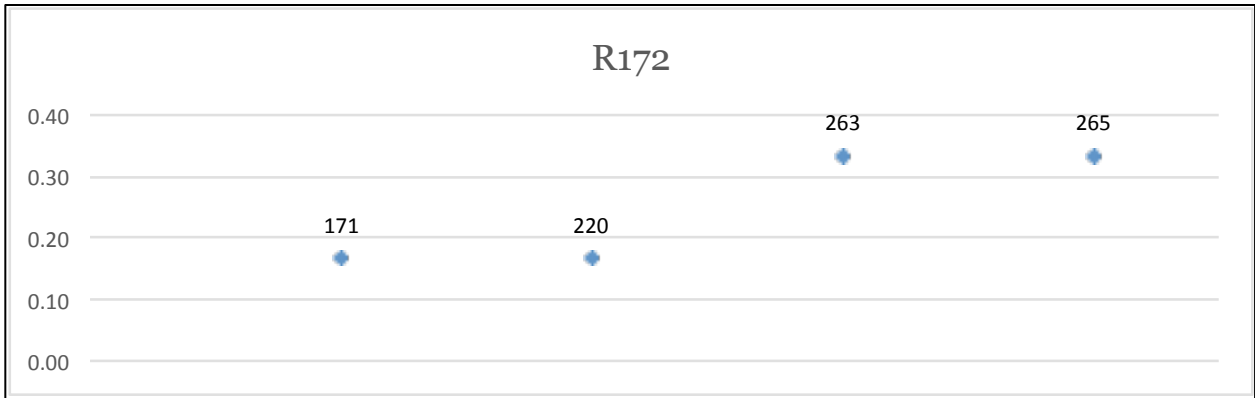

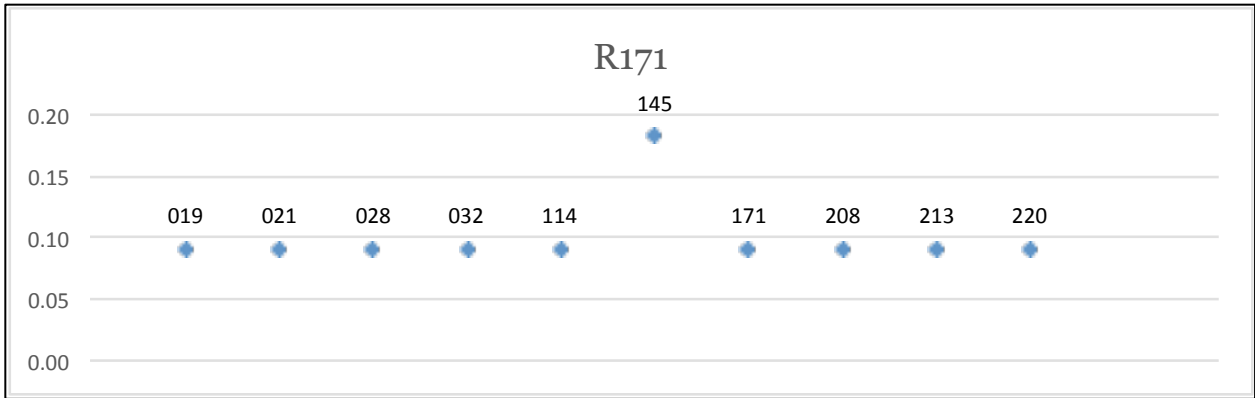

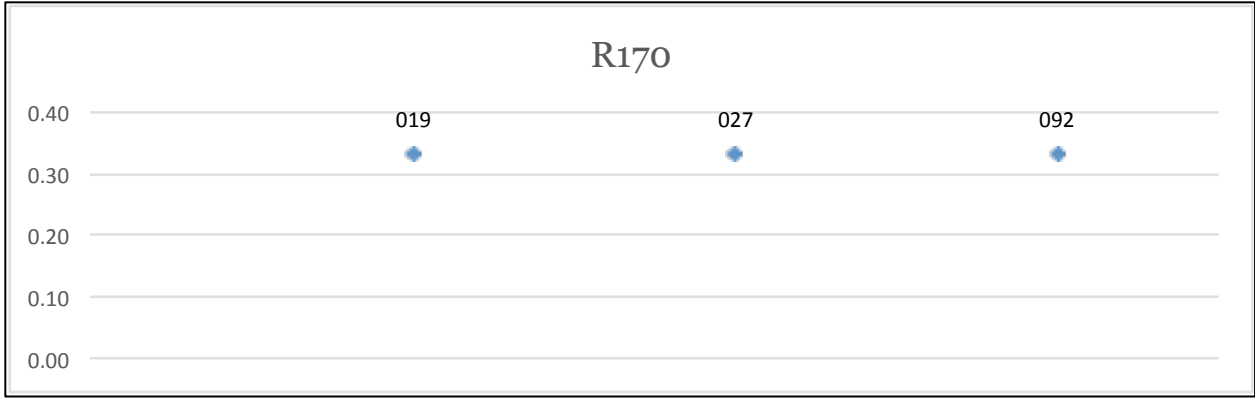

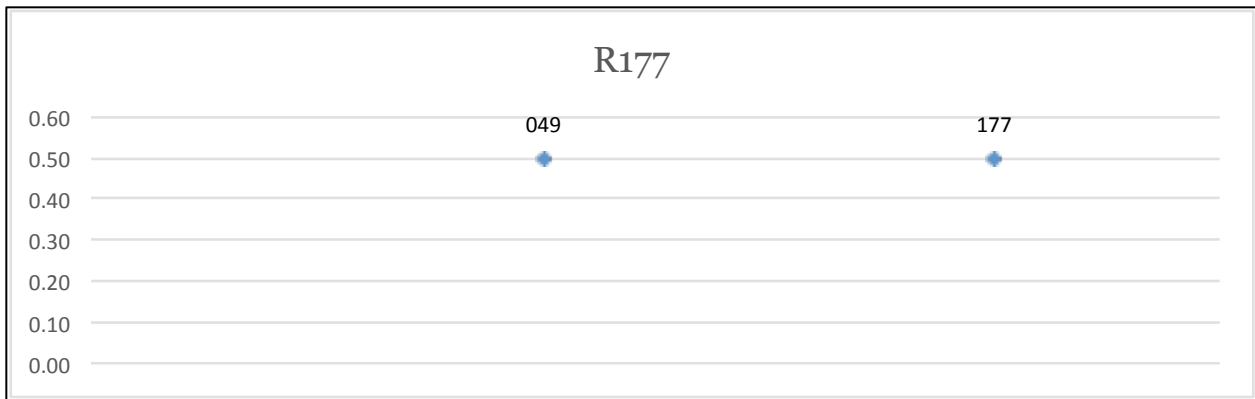

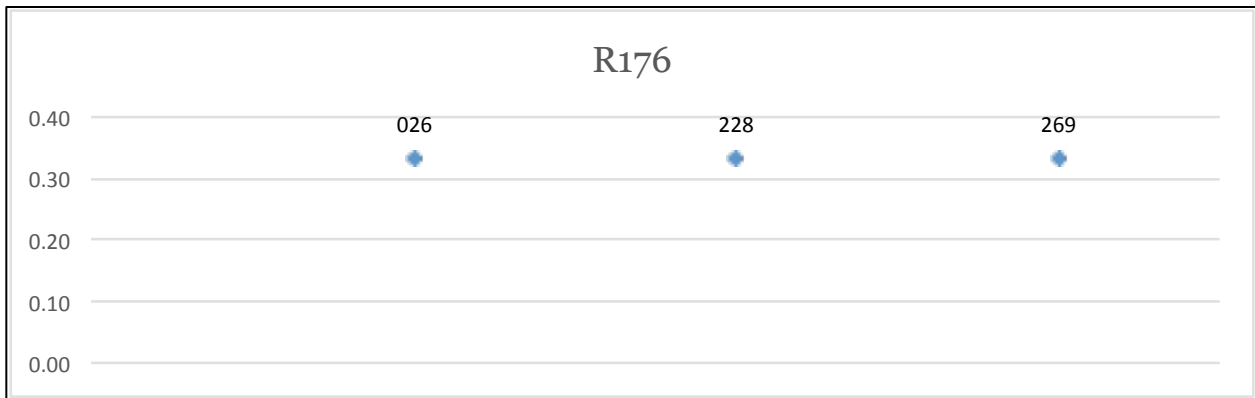

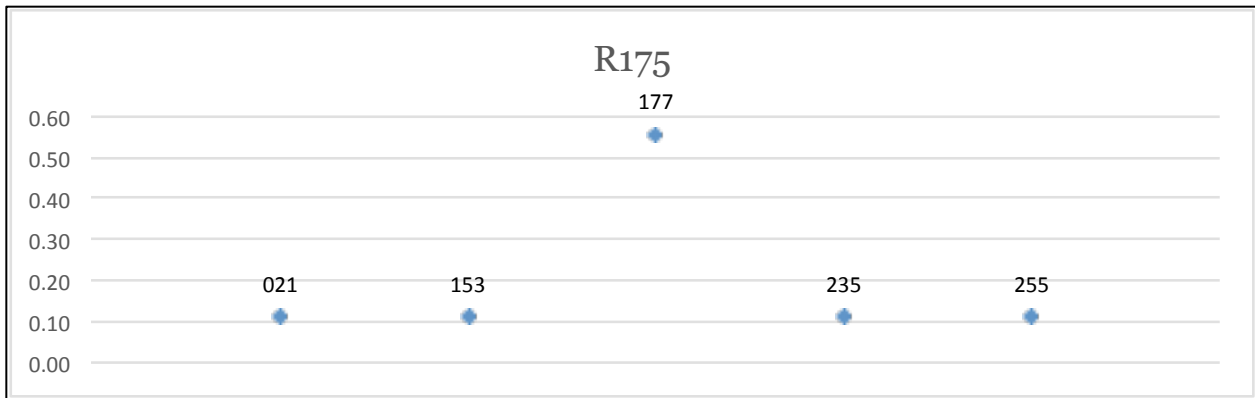

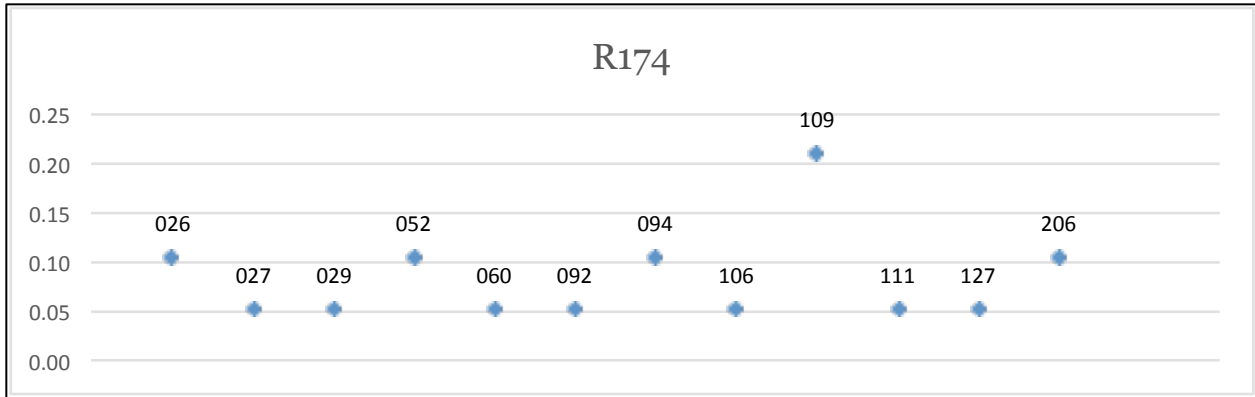

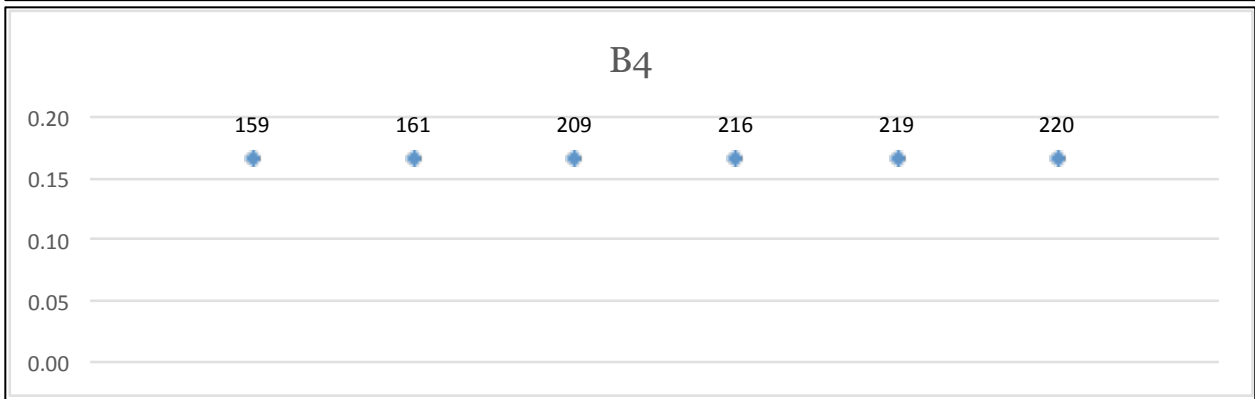

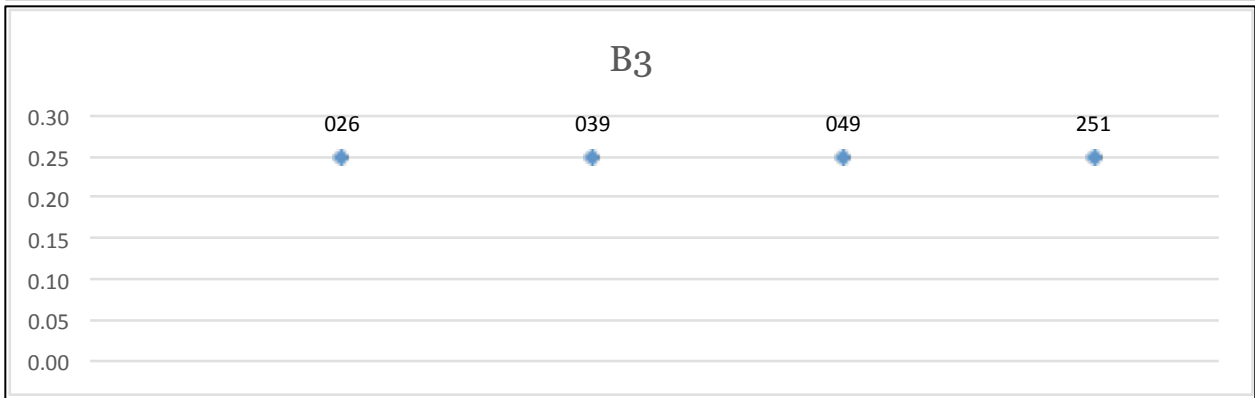

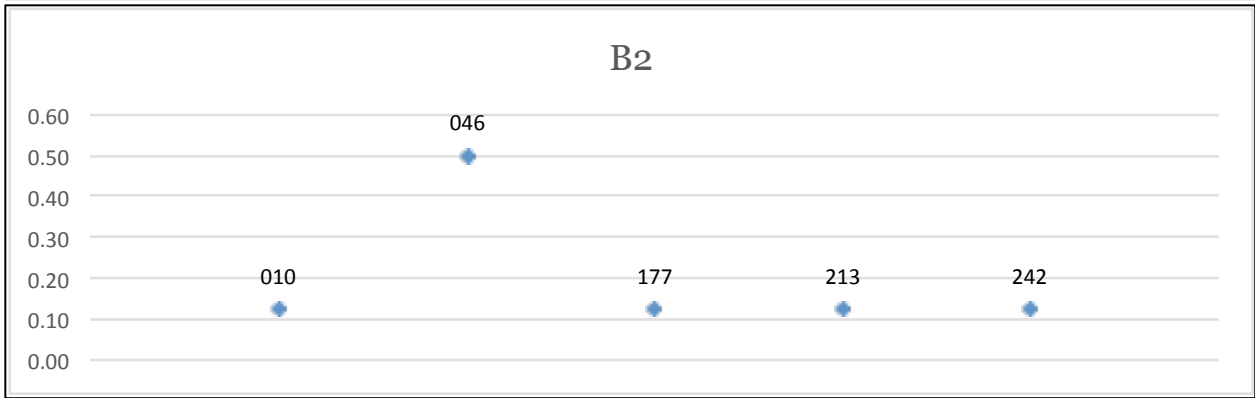

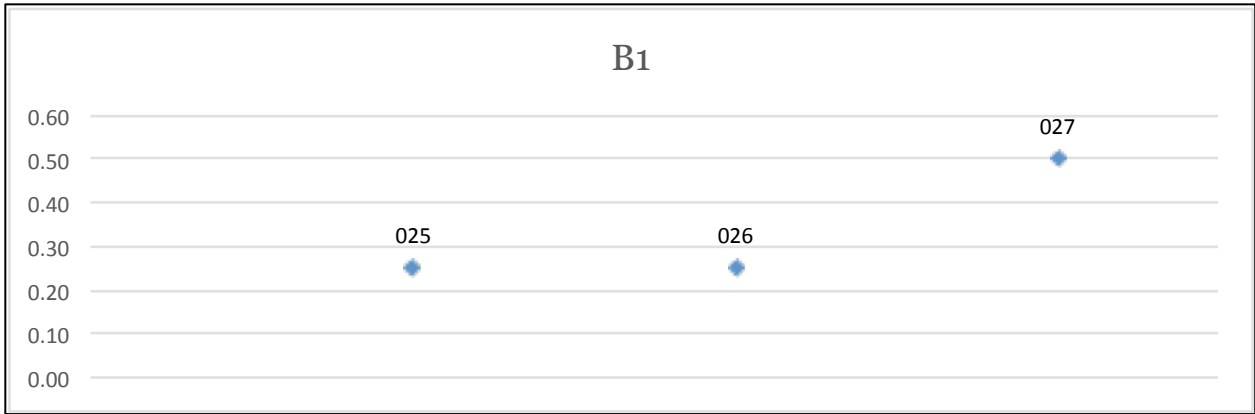

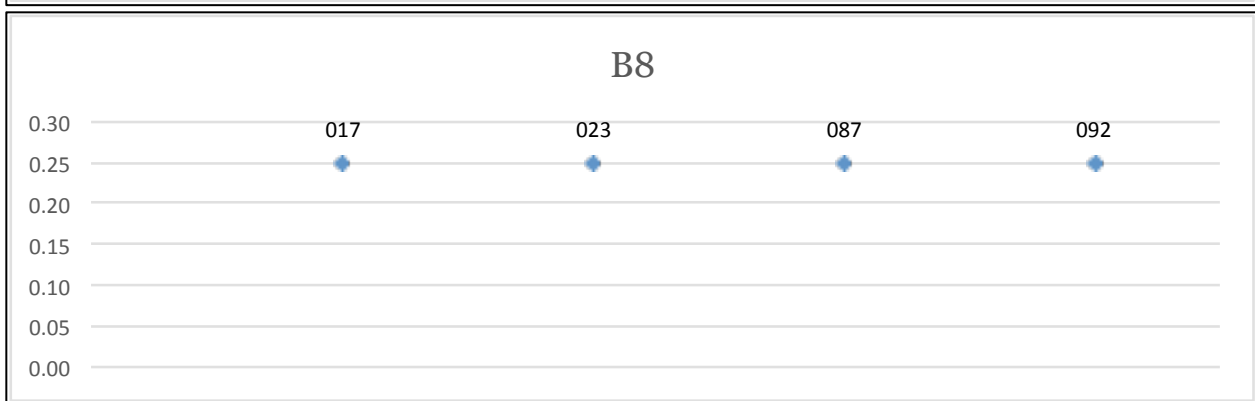

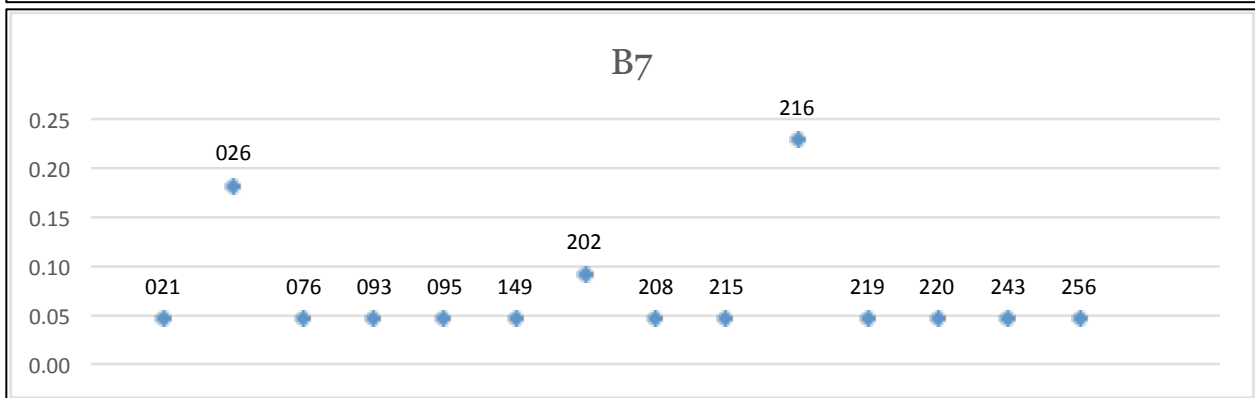

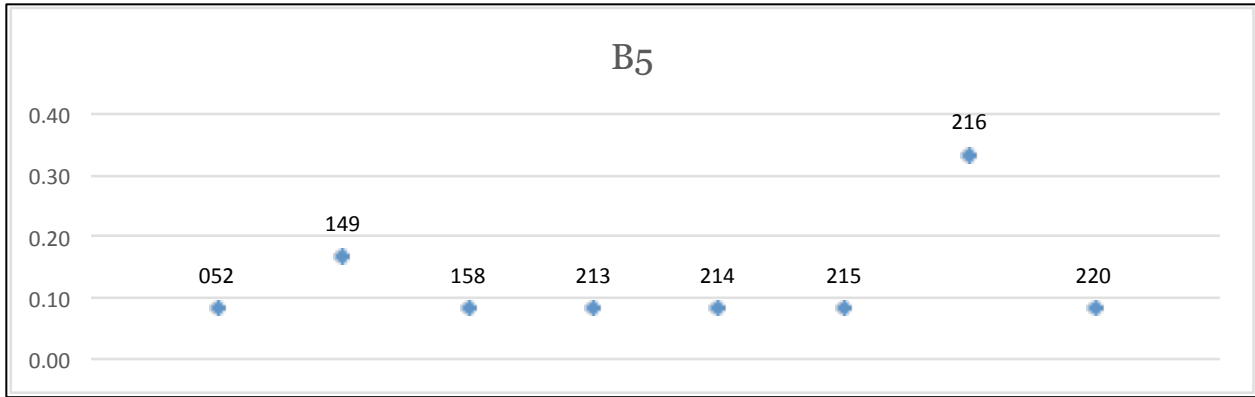

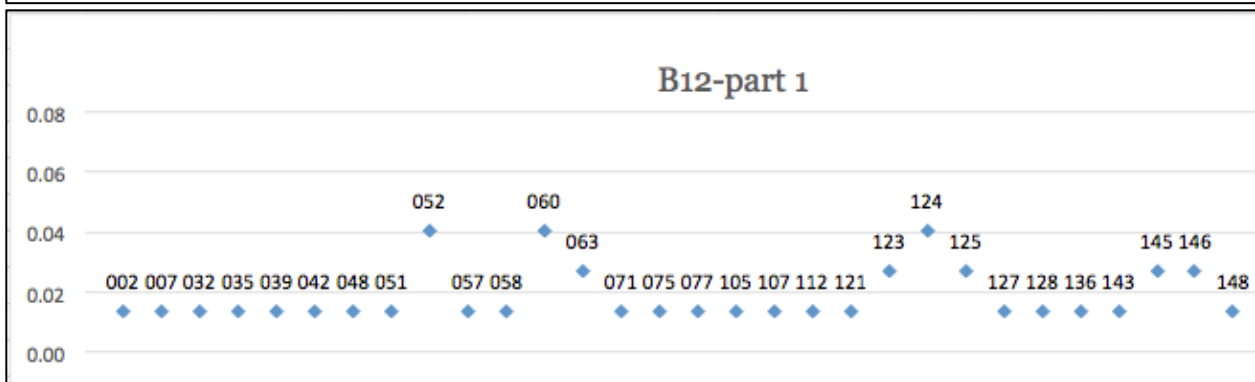

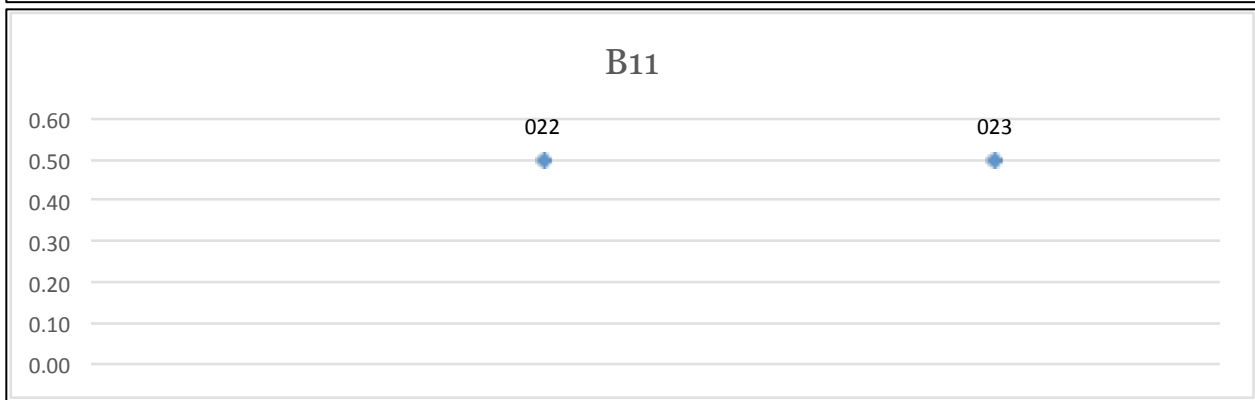

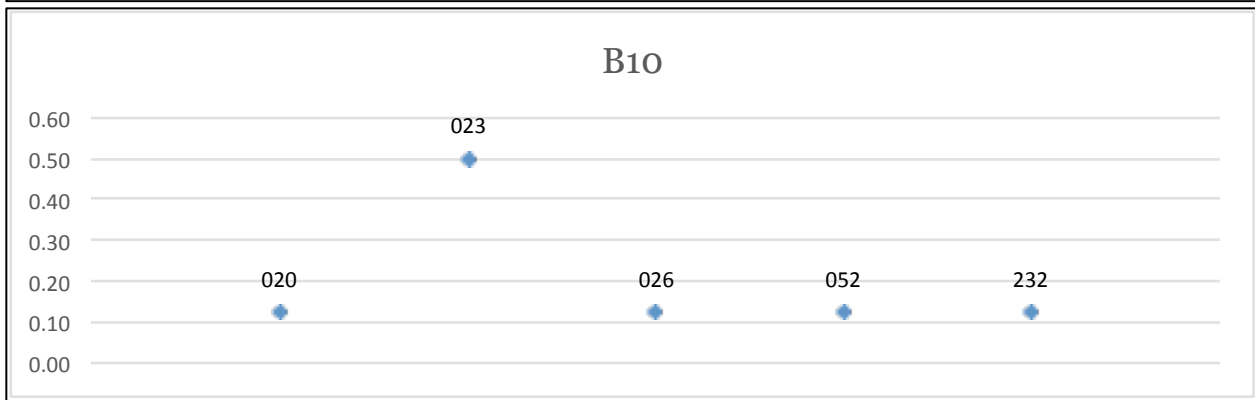

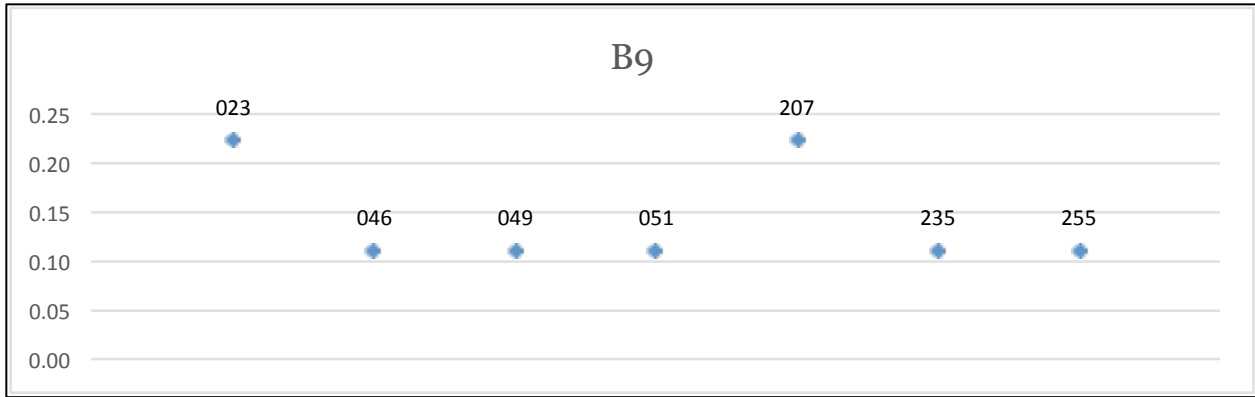

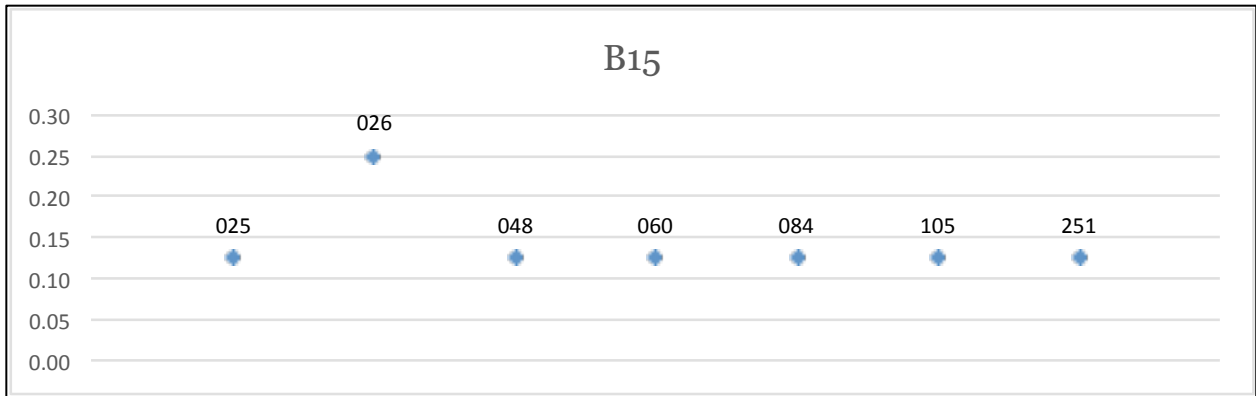

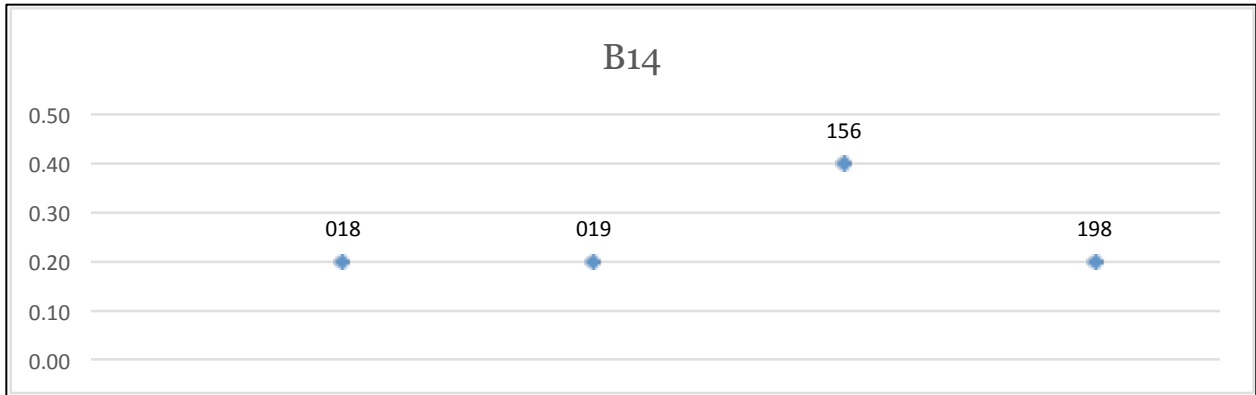

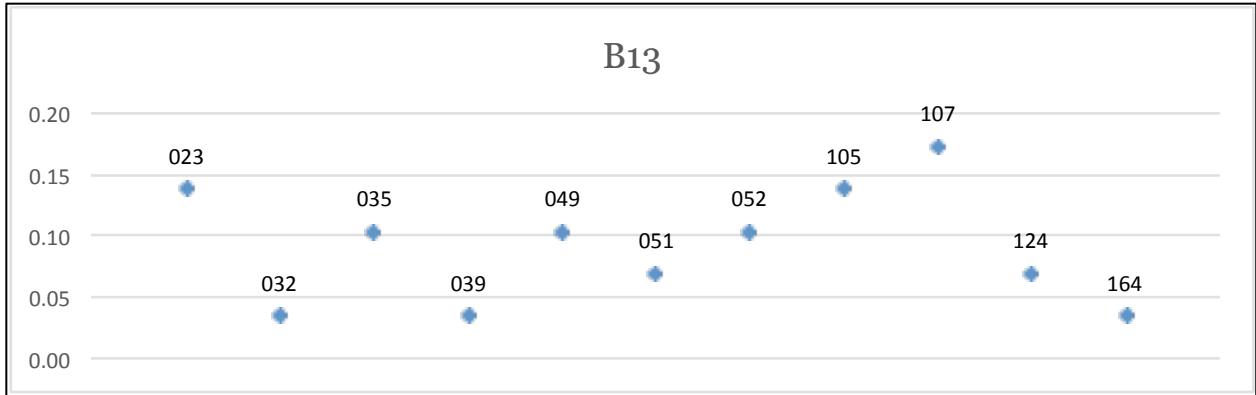

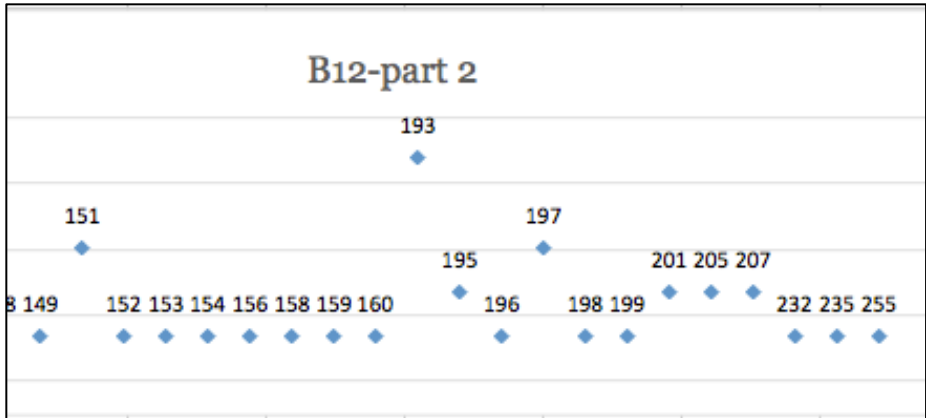

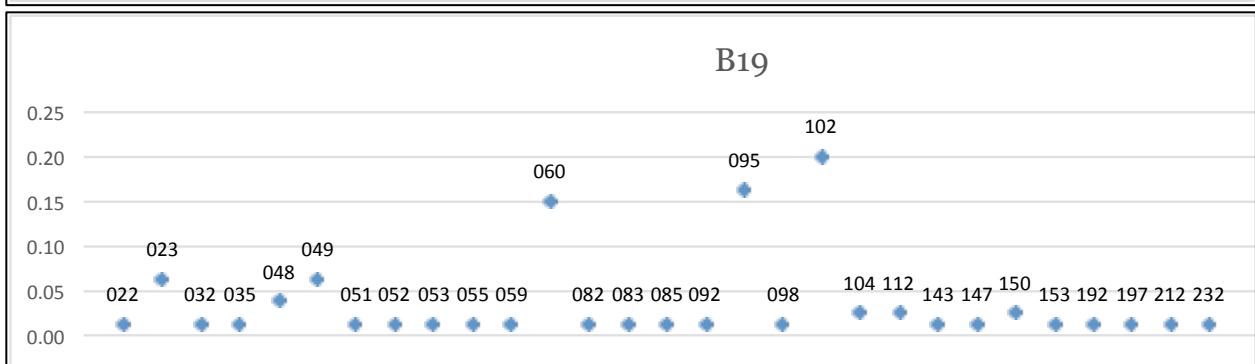

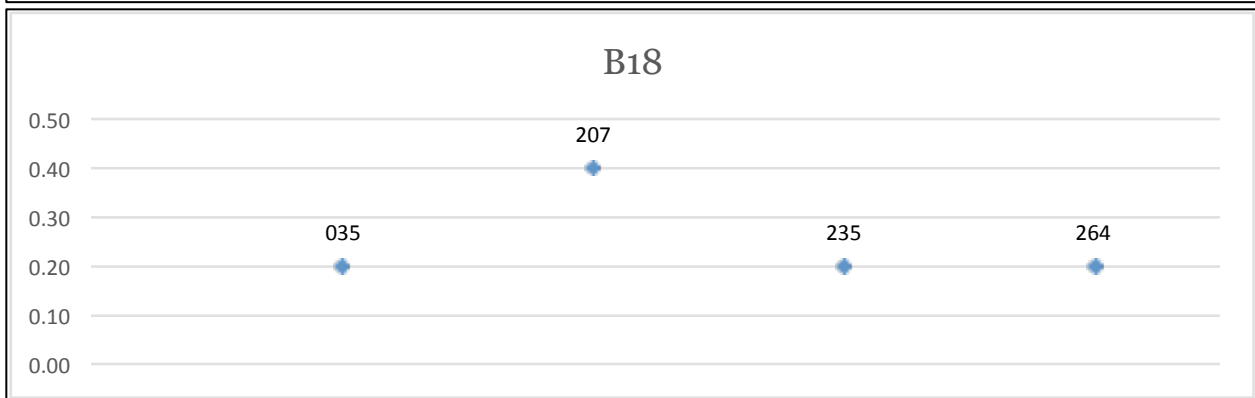

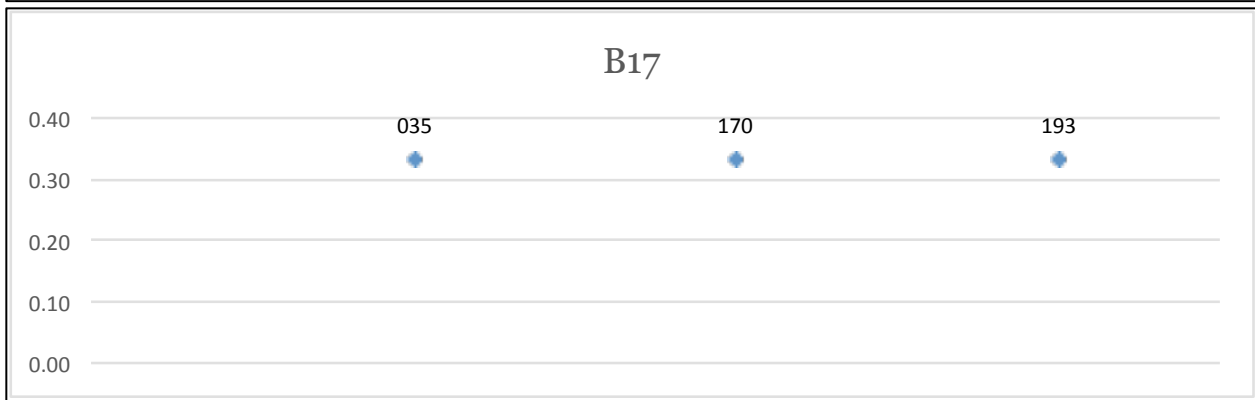

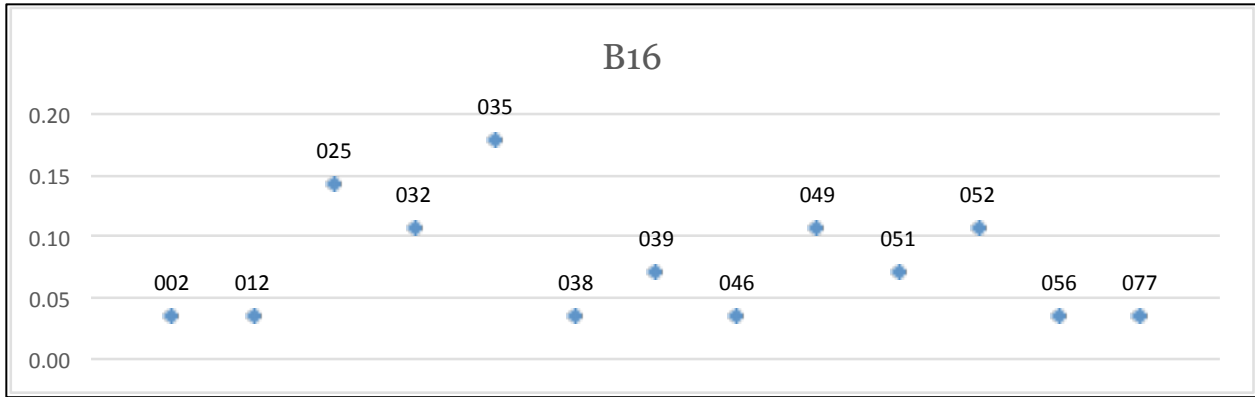

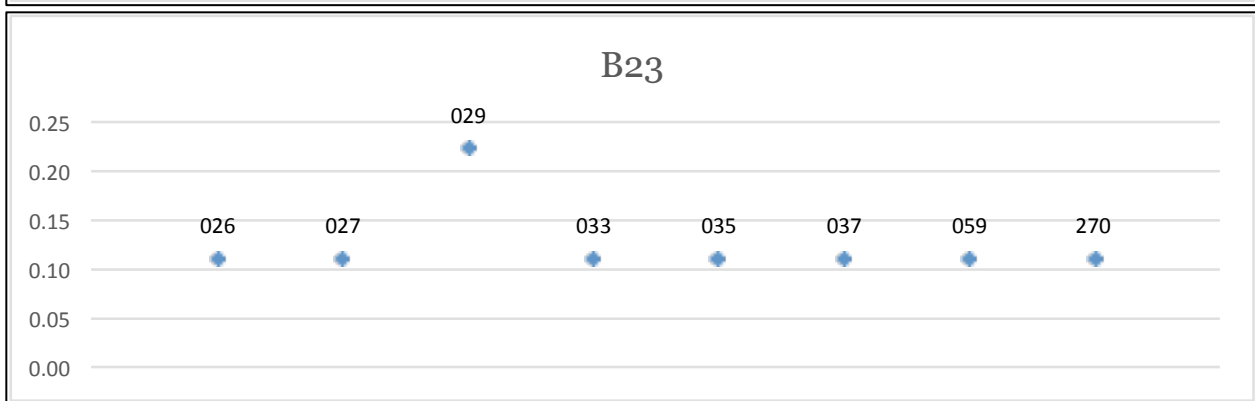

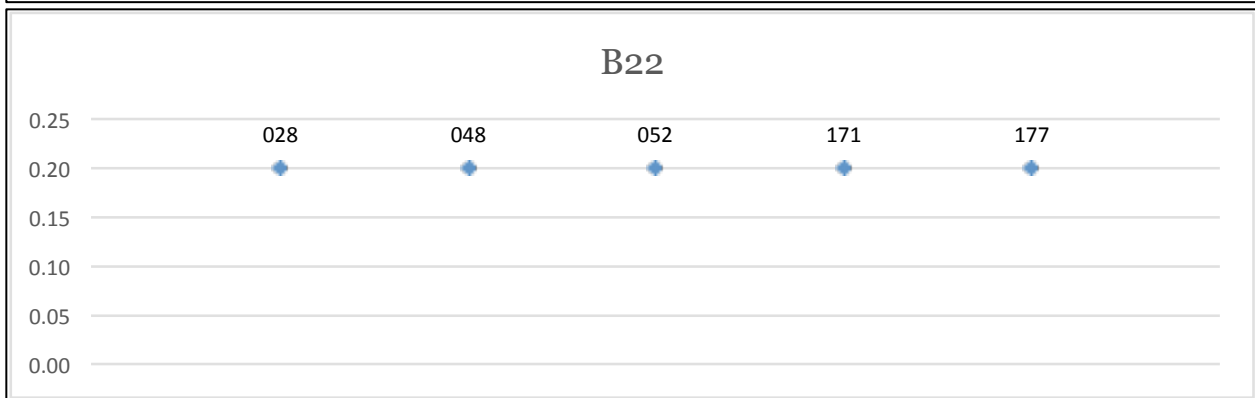

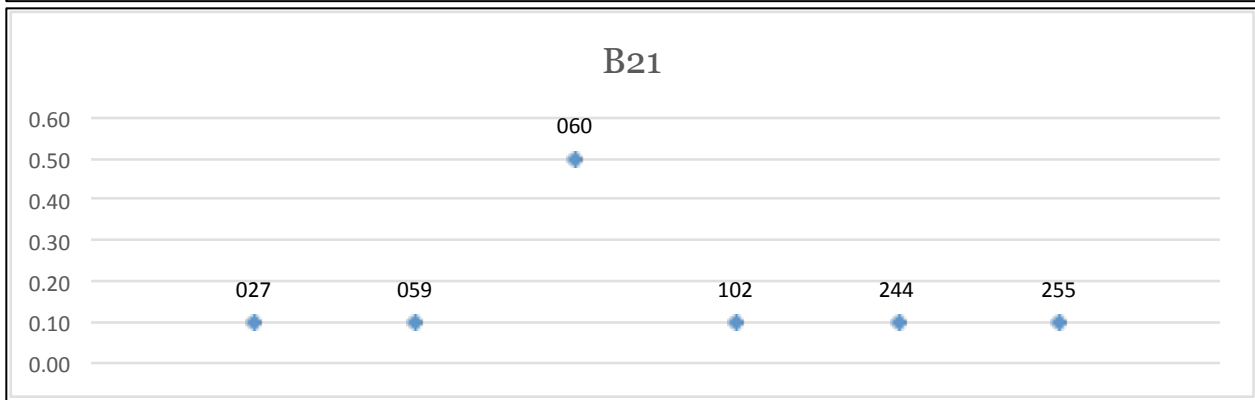

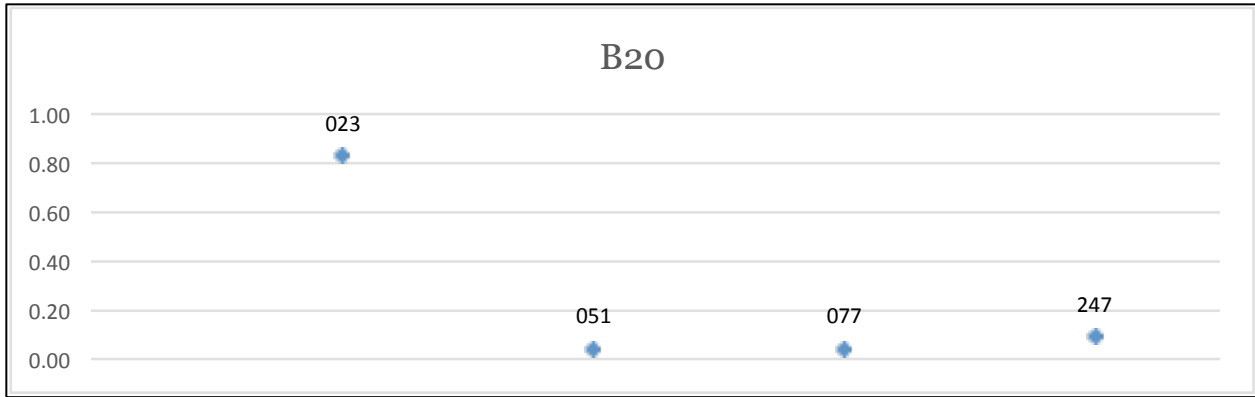

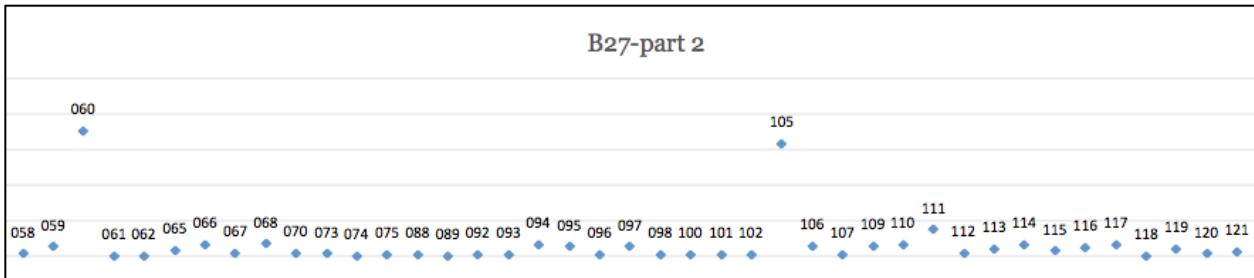

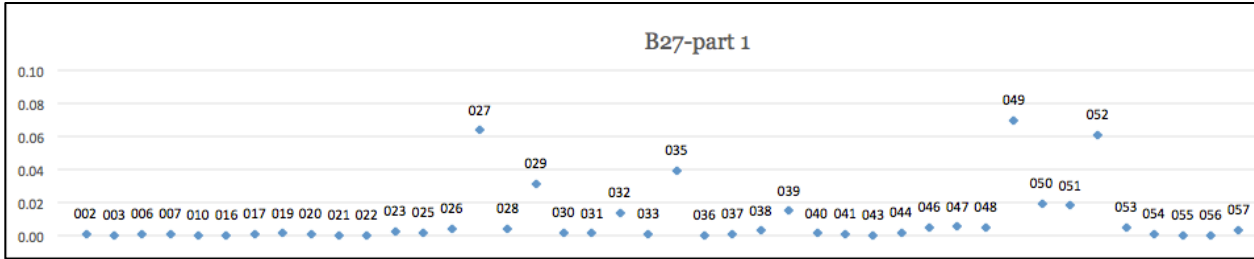

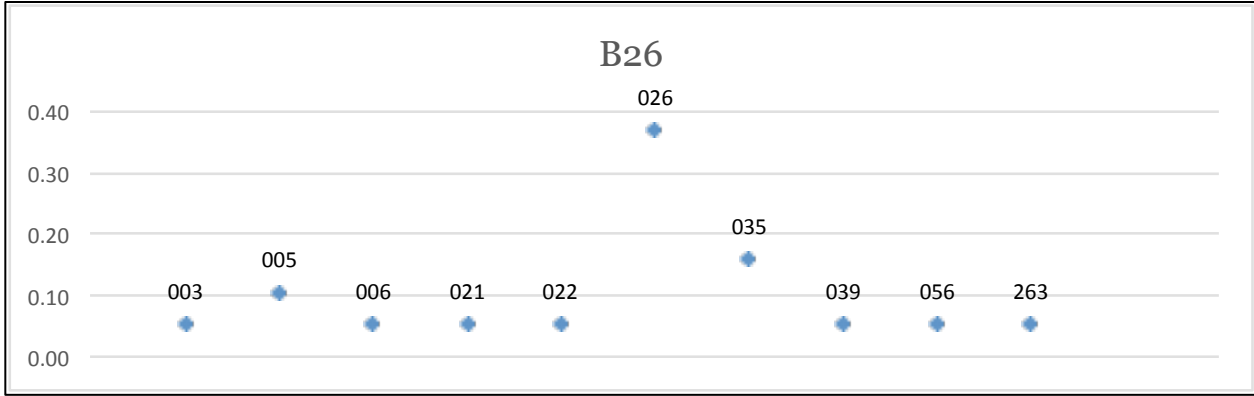

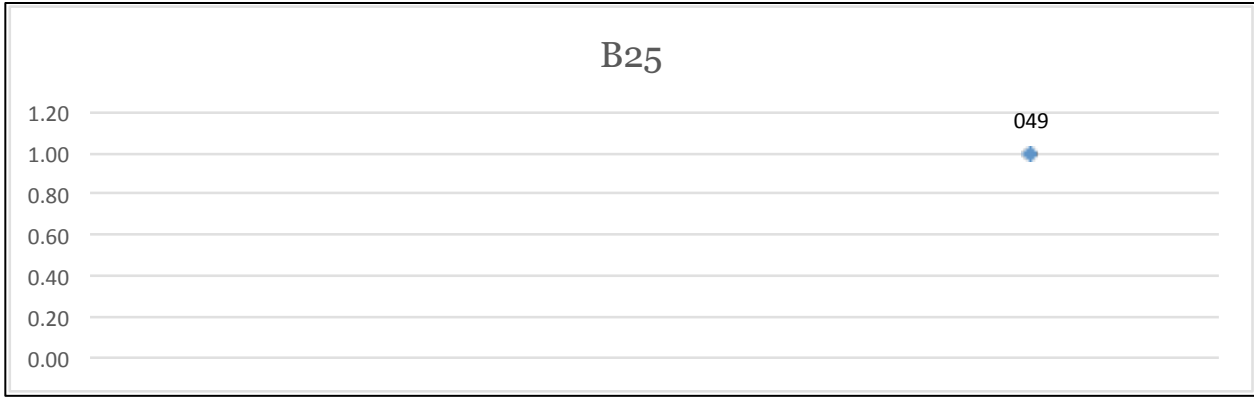

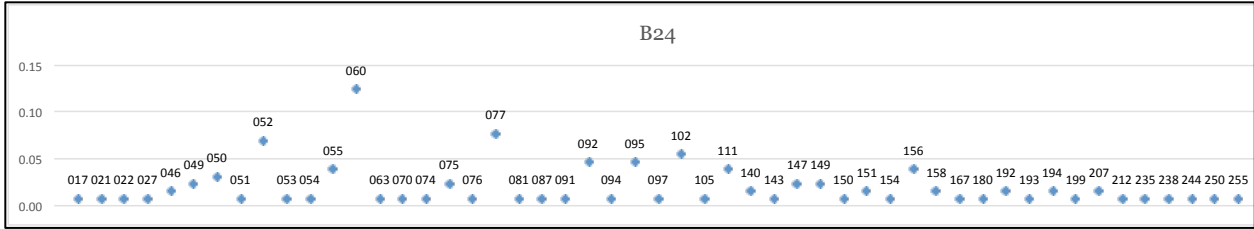

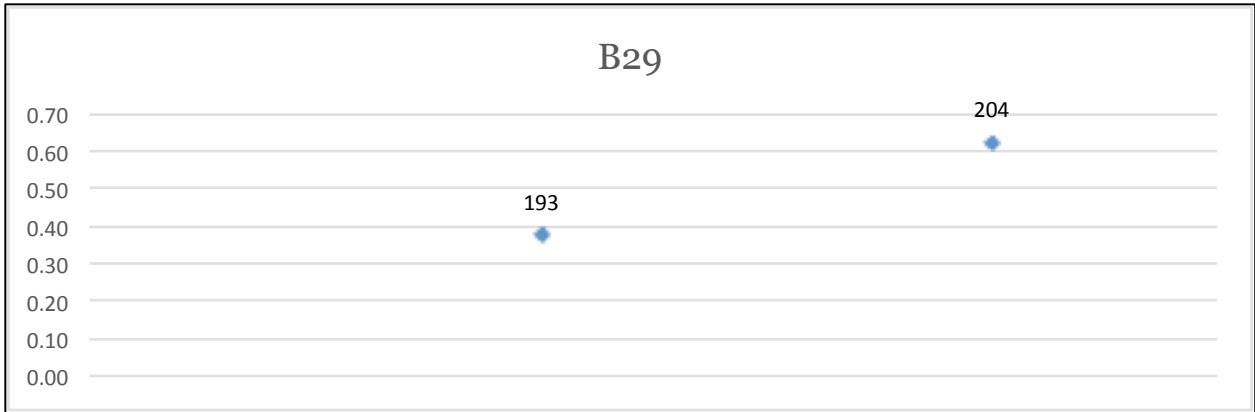

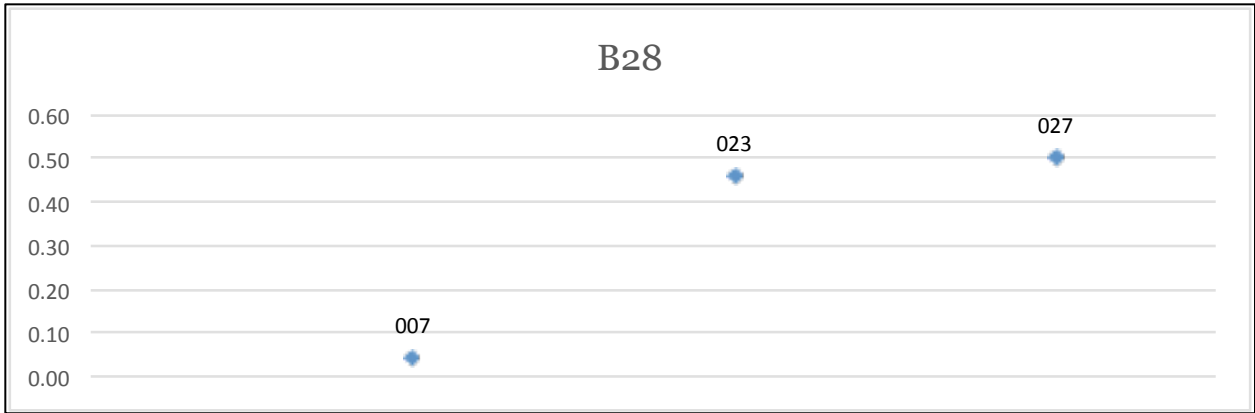

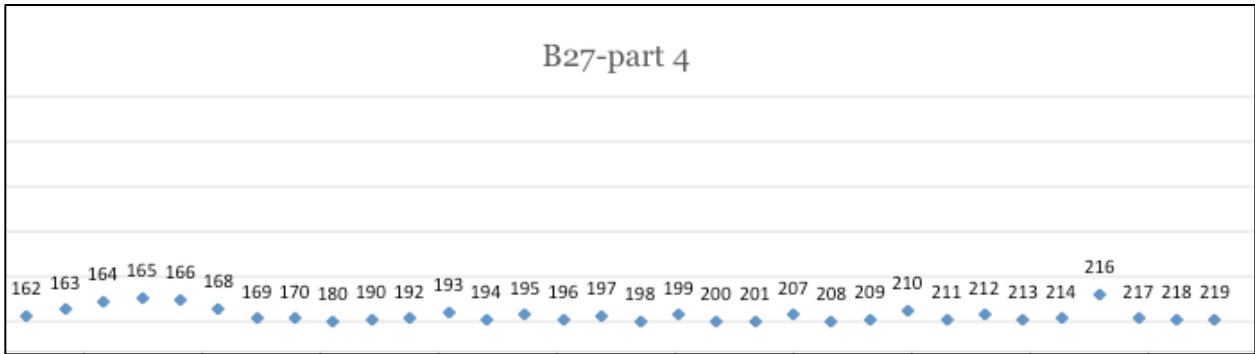

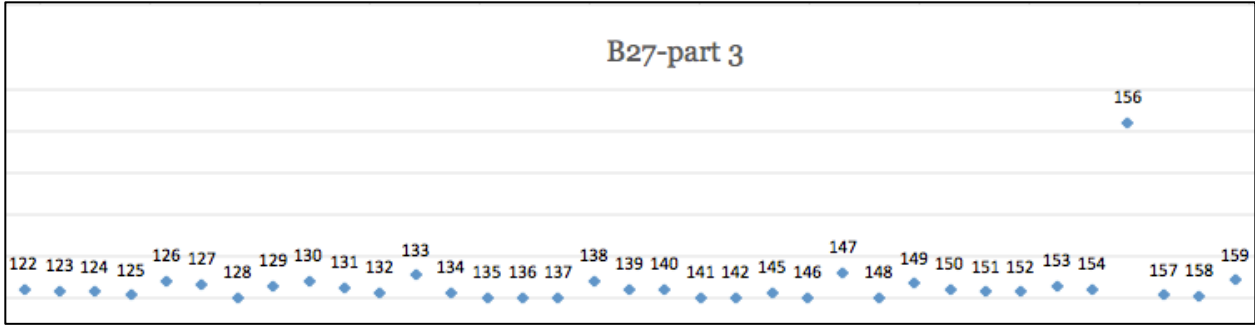

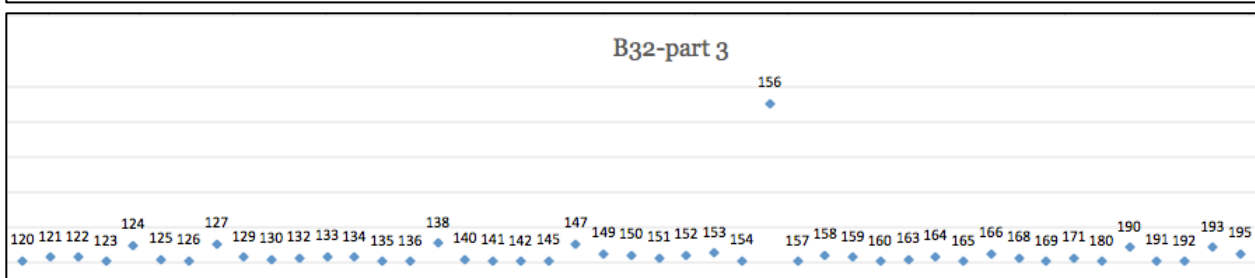

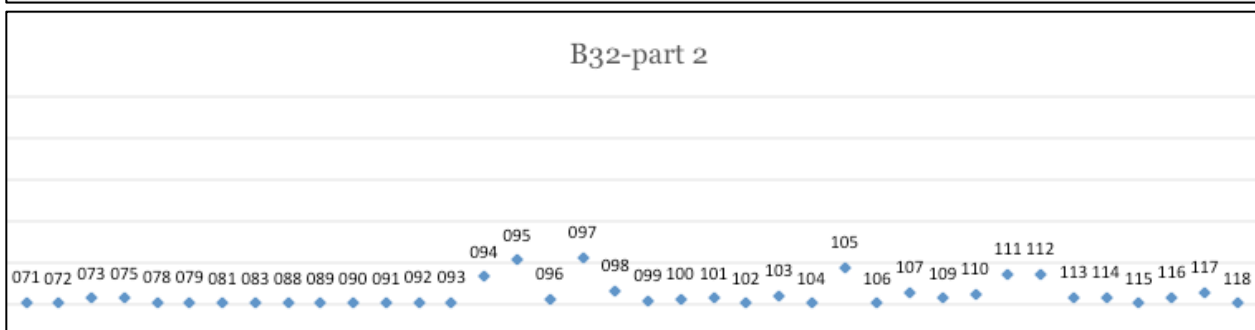

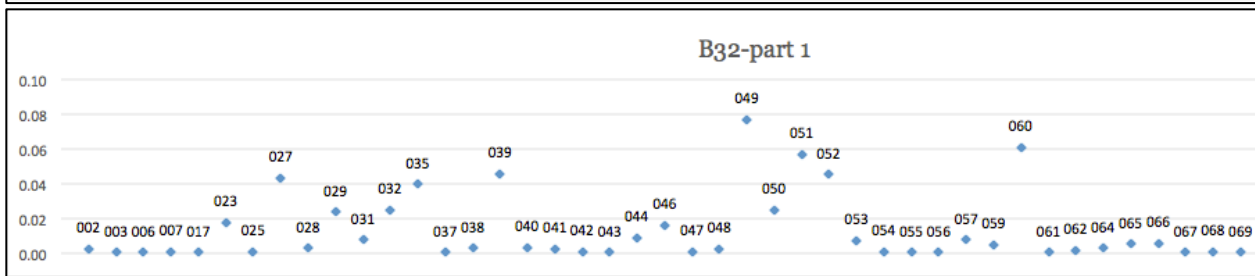

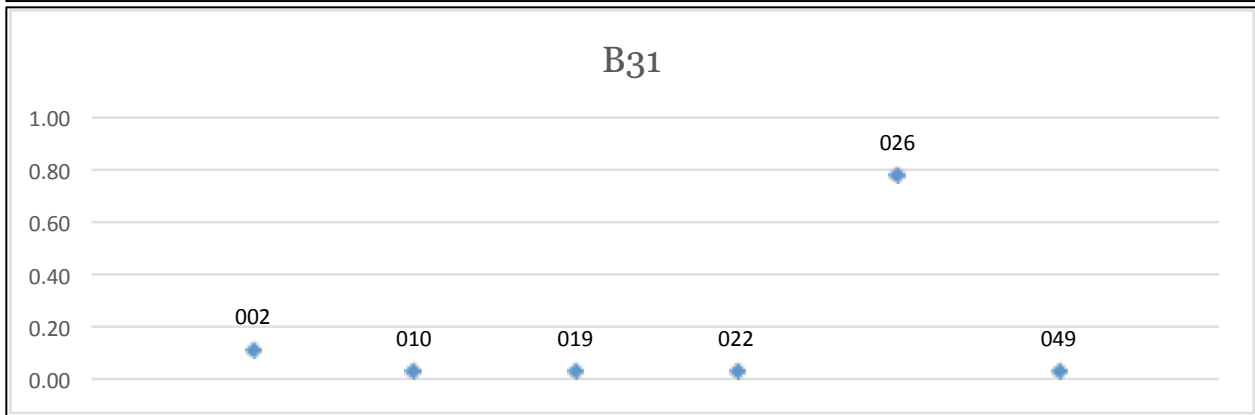

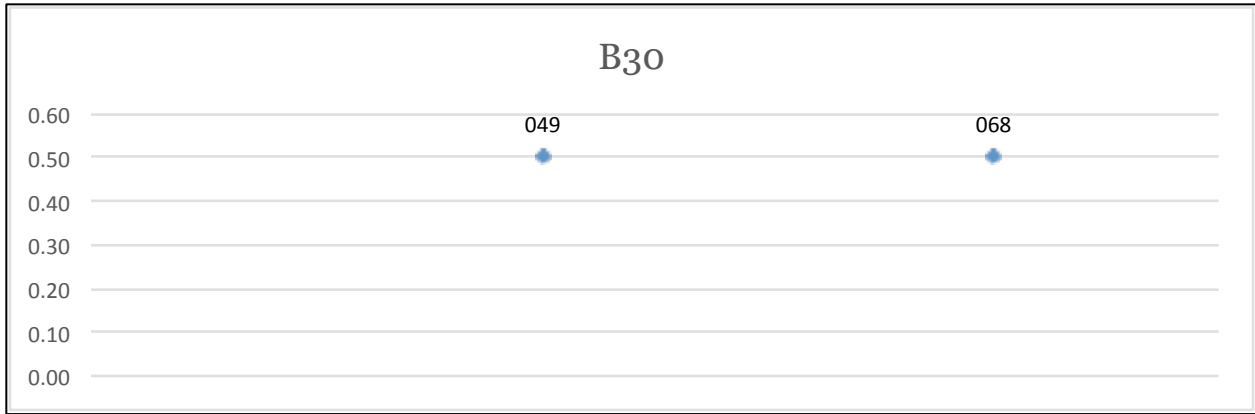

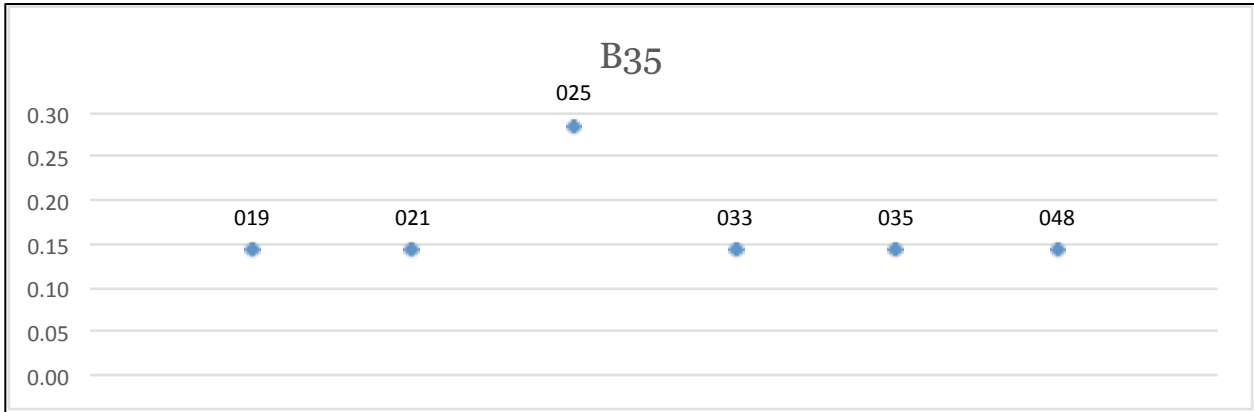

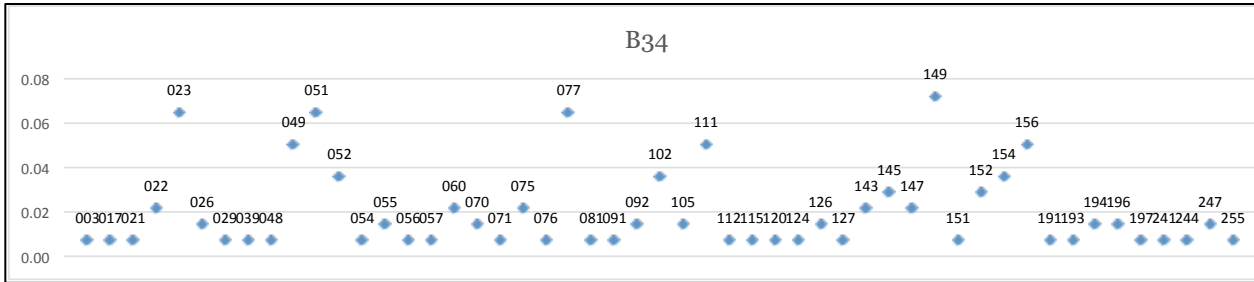

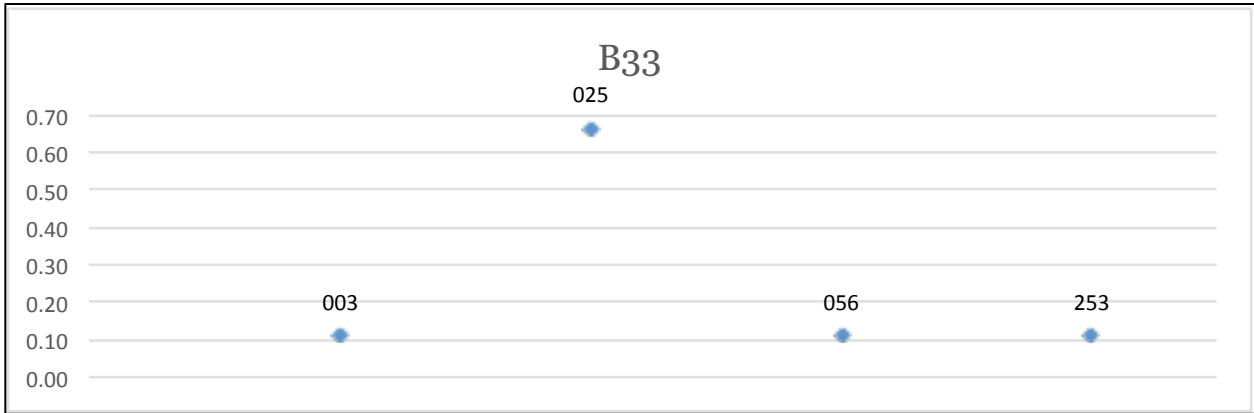

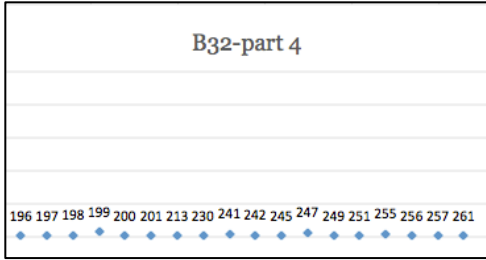

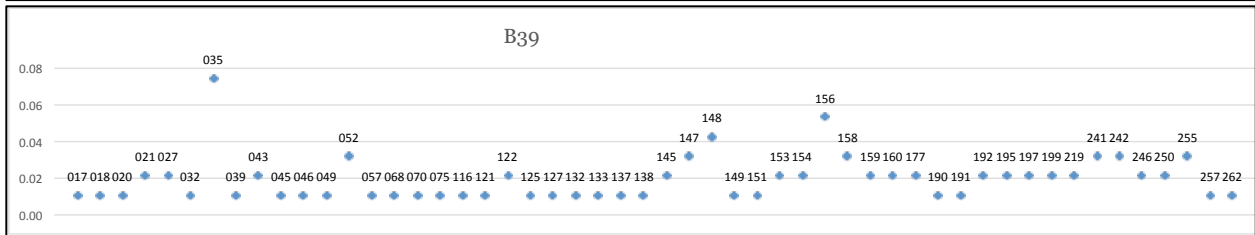

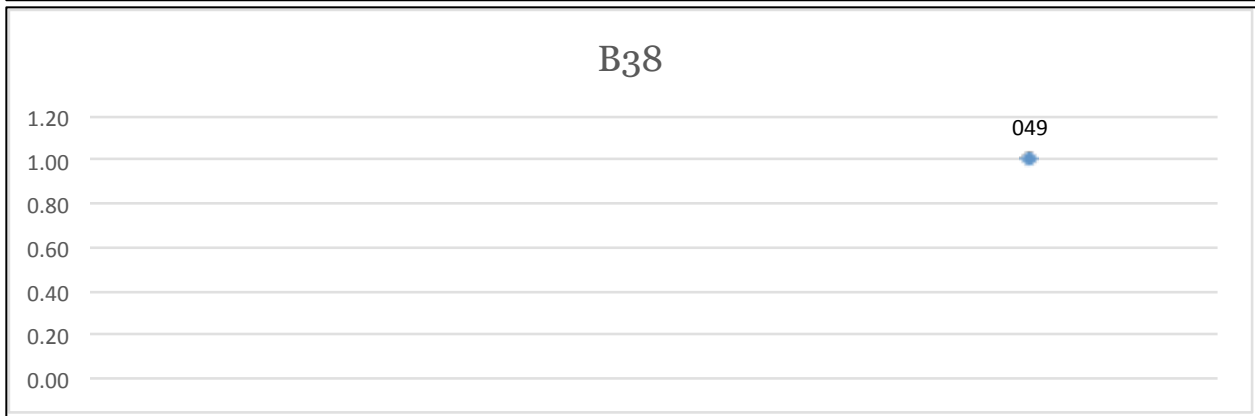

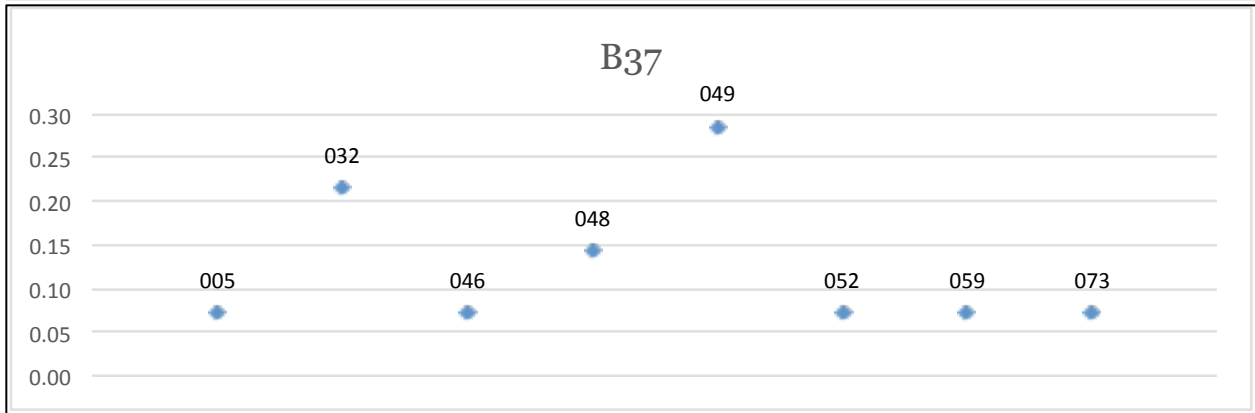

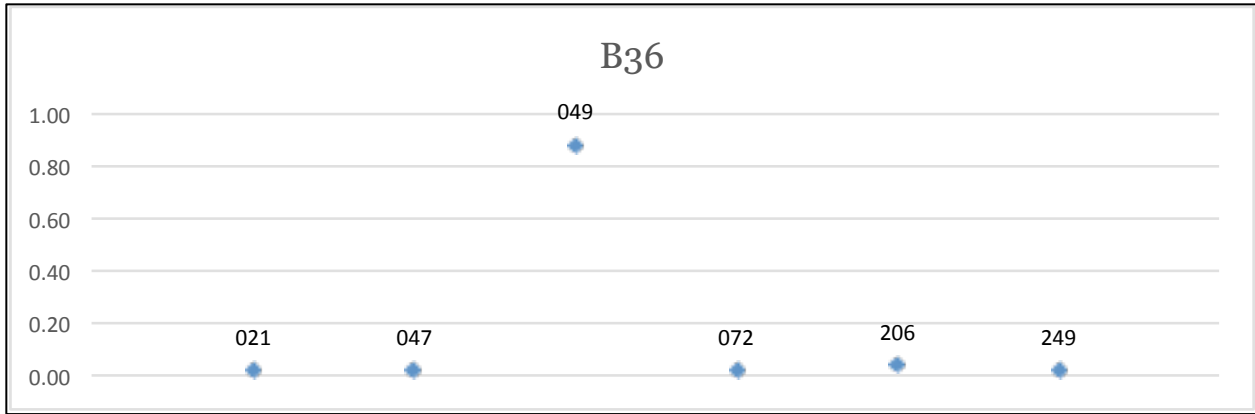

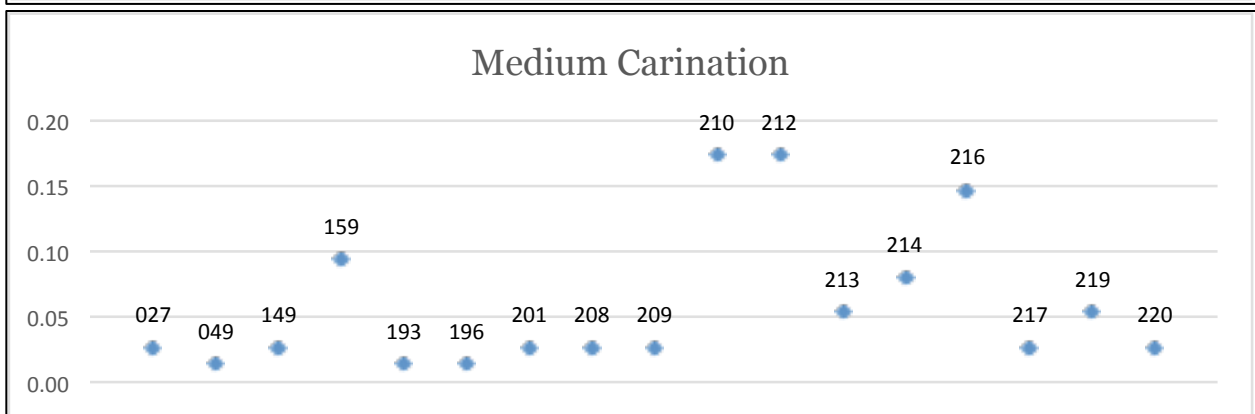

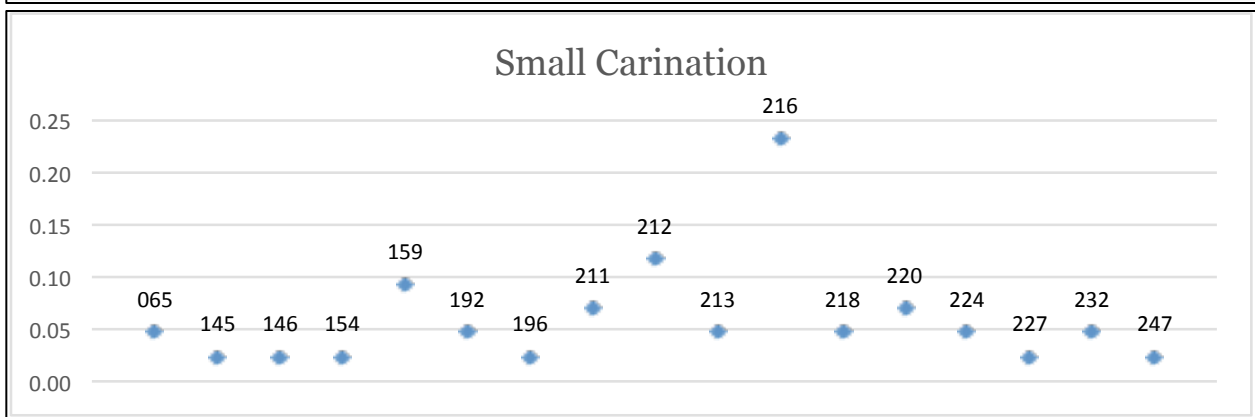

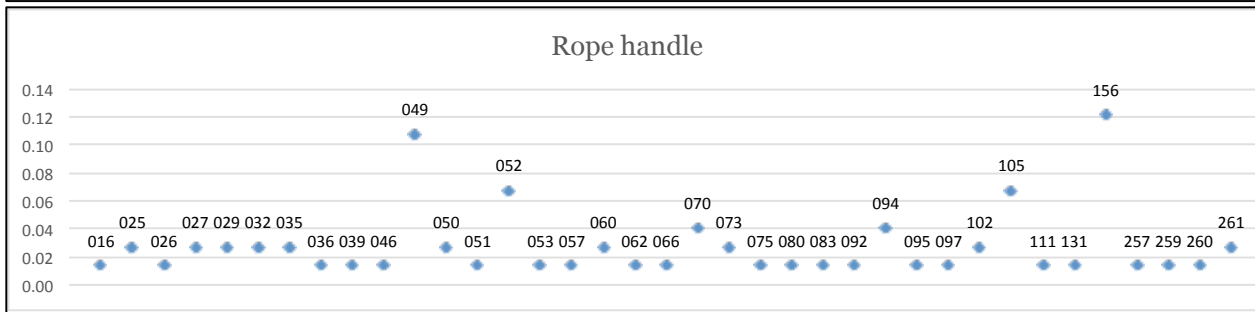

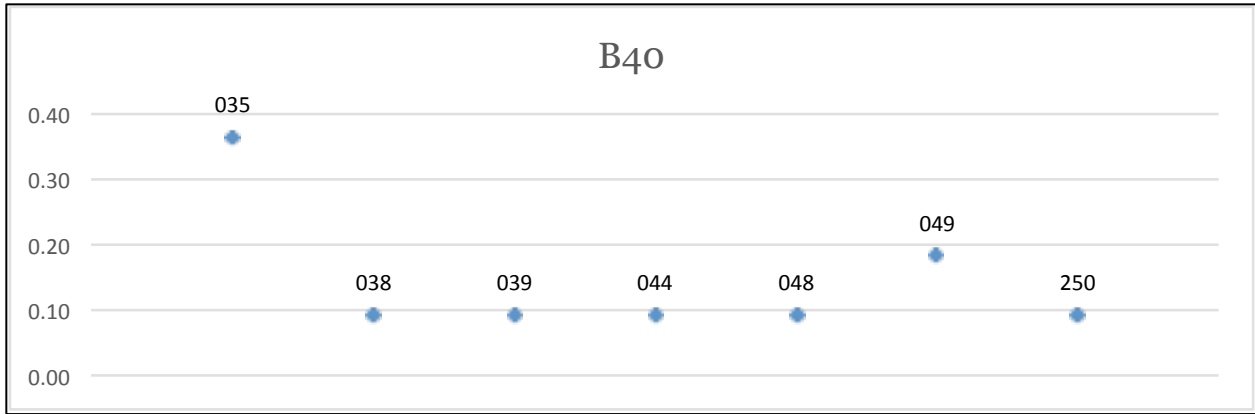

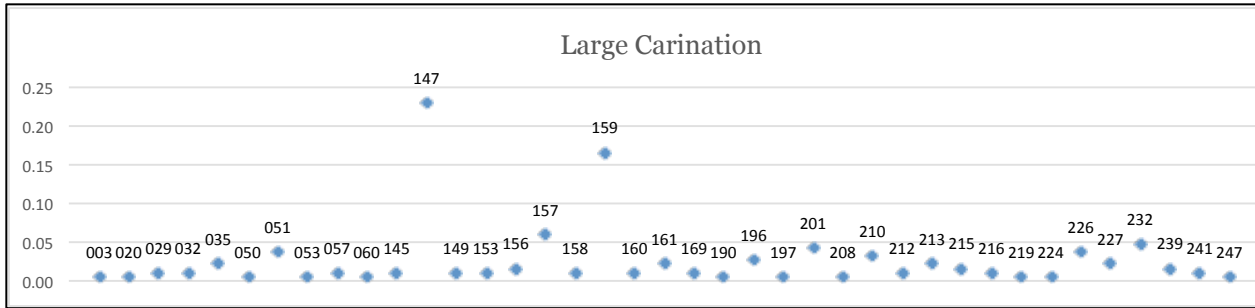

APPENDIX E

CONCORDANCE OF LEVEL NUMBERS AND UNIT INFORMATION

The three-digit level numbers used in the table of raw data (Appendix F) correspond to excavation units. These excavation units were assigned by the excavators on site and the abbreviations are as follows:

- TZ – Tepe Zargaran, one of the largest excavation areas in the 2004-2008 excavations, this lies just outside of the main citadel to the East.
- BH – Bala Hissar, the excavation area comprising the main gate of the citadel. This area contained the oldest excavated deposits thus far.
- Ch – Chantier, or area, this denotes horizontally identified areas within the Tepe Zargaran excavations. The Bala Hissar area was not subdivided using this nomenclature.
- UF – Unite Fouille, or excavation unit, this denotes the soil deposit and the finds within it. These are vertical designations that for Tepe Zargaran fall within the horizontal area designated by chantier.
- Sec – Sector, used only in the Tepe Zargaran excavations, this denotes a further horizontal subdivision within certain chantiers.
- Dec – Décapage, or cleaning, these are large areas of surface material or otherwise disturbed deposits.

APPENDIX F

RAW DATA

The following table is a compendium of raw field data. Diameters, which were calculated using a concentric chart, were frequently given a minimum and maximum number if the sherd was not large enough to securely measure a definitive diameter.

Each row represents one sherd and the columns show the following information:

- Level- this 3 digit number is the identification number for the stratigraphic deposit. A concordance of Level numbers and their stratigraphic information can be found in Appendix E.
- Fabric- The fabric identification of the sherd; all coarse fabrics are lumped together as discussed in Chapter Two.
- Rim- The Upper Profile Type number; if the sherd is not from an Upper Profile Type this box is left empty.
- Base- The Lower Profile Type number; if the sherd is not from a Lower Profile Type this box is left empty.
- Other Part- If the sherd is a handle or an otherwise diagnostic body sherd, it is described in this box.
- Min- This is the minimum diameter in centimeters of whatever sherd is being measured. If it is an Upper Profile Type, this is the minimum diameter of the rim as measured with a concentric diameter chart at the outer margin of the lip. If it is a Lower Profile Type, this is the minimum diameter of the base as measured with a concentric chart at the outer margin of the base.

- Max- This is the maximum diameter in centimeters of whatever sherd is being measured. If it is an Upper Profile Type, this is the maximum diameter of the rim as measured with a concentric diameter chart at the outer margin of the lip. If it is a Lower Profile Type, this is the maximum diameter of the base as measured with a concentric chart at the outer margin of the base. If both “Min” and “Max” are left empty, the sherd was too small to determine an estimated diameter.
- Decoration- If the sherd is decorated, a basic description is given here. It is only marked as “unslipped” if the type usually has a slip.
- Notes- A catch-all category, notes can include information about shape, fabric, decoration, or any information not easily placed in other categories.
