LIST OF ARTICLES PUBLISHED FROM THE BATTLE CREEK SANITARIUM

NUTRITION LABORATORY SINCE 1921

By Helen S. Mitchell and Coworkers

1. Reproduction on "Synthetic" Diets When Purified Agar is Added to the Mixture. Am. J. Physiol. 62, 557 (1922).

Normal reproduction was secured by the addition of purified agar to the synthetic diet on which normal reproduction had not previously been obtained. Therefore it was concluded that roughage may be a more important factor than had previously been supposed.

2. Use of the Animal Laboratory in Teaching Nutrition and Dietetics. J. Home Ec. 15, 701 (1923).

An outline of the animal laboratory work successfully used in the nutrition and dietetic classes of the Sanitarium School of Home Economics is presented.

Note: Such a summary of laboratory methods for teaching is distinctly helpful to others in the same field.

3. Hair Ball Formation in Rats in Relation to Food Consistency. Mitchell, H. S.; Bradshaw, P. J.; and Carlson, E. R. Am. J. Physiol. 68, 203 (1924)

The formation of hair balls in the stomachs of rats is attributed to the high fat content and sticky consistency of the food. The basis for this conclusion is the observation that 90 per cent of the rats on paste foods containing 25 to 27 per cent of fat developed hair balls whereas out of 135 rats on dry foods and 13 rats on liquid foods none developed hair balls. A reduced fat content of the foods proved beneficial. The detrimental influence of hair balls on the growth and well-being of the animals is discussed.

Note: Such a phenomena as hair ball formation in rats has not previously been reported in the literature.

4. Variations in the Intestinal Flora of Rats. Mich. Acad. Science, Arts and Letters 4, 505 (1924)

Observations are reported concerning the intestinal flora changes occurring in rats on rations in which the type of protein or carbohydrate was varied. Indications were that changes of intestinal flora to an aciduric type are not necessarily parallel to improvement in growth or well-being of the animal. Lactose which promotes a marked change in flora is poorly absorbed and consequently growth is retarded when this is used as the sole source of carbohydrate.

5. Egg White vs. Casein as Source of Protein in the Diet of Rats. Am. J. Physiol. 74, 359 (1925)

Egg white, which has been considered by some workers to be inadequate as a source of protein, is shown to be but slightly less adequate than casein for the growth of young rats. It is pointed out that egg white, which is low in certain minerals, is a convenient source of protein in experimental rations where the mineral content is to be controlled.

Note: Egg white has since been used by this and other laboratories where experimental rations low in certain vitamins or minerals was desired.

6. The Relation of Iron from Various Sources to Nutritional Anemia. Mitchell, H. S. and Schmidt, L., J. Biol. Chem. 70, 471 (1926)

A true nutritional anemia was produced in rats from parents that had been fed on diets low in iron. The Hemoglobin and erythrocyte increase were used as criteria for comparing the availability of iron from food sources and from iron salts. The comparative value of foods in this respect was indicated as follows: molasses, meat and ovoferrin, very good; egg yolk and spinach, good; raisins and dates, uncertain because of incomplete consumption. Of the inorganic sources tested a definite line of differentiation occurred between the soluble and insoluble salts.

7. Comparative Physiological Values of Five Carbohydrates, Based on Growth and Fecal Analysis. Am. J. Physiol. 79, 537 (1927)

A comparison of the influence of lactose, starch, dextrine, sucrose and maltose on the intestinal flora and on growth shows that the percentage of acidophilus runs parallel to the amount of sugar lost in the feces, but in general the rate of growth is in the reverse ratio. The high percentage of acidophilus persisted so long as diarrhea accompanied the feeding of lactose, but intestinal stasis produced while on the same lactose diet allowed the flora to revert to the putrifactive type. The use of certain carbohydrates brought about a change of intestinal flora to the aciduric type, but the continued use of such over a long period of time resulted in the loss of its effectiveness and reversion of the flora to the putrifactive type.

8. Comparative Physiological Values of Different Amounts of Lactose, Based on Growth and Fecal Analysis. Am. J. Physiol. 79, 542 (1927)

Observations are presented which suggest that where a change in intestinal flora is desired it may be made without interference in growth or well-being if lactose furnishes no more than 30 per cent of the carbohydrate in the diet or 50 per cent of the total diet.

Note: It is doubtful whether observations of this type on rats are entirely applicable to human beings.

9. The Relation of Inorganic Iron to Nutritional Anemia, Mitchell, H. S. and Vaughn, M. Proc. Soc. Biol. Chem. 1927, pp 78.

A brief preliminary report of the data presented in the following publication.

10. The Relation of Inorganic Iron to Nutritional Anemia. Mitchell, H. S. and Vaughn, M. J. Biol. Chem. 75, 123 (1927)

The utilization of iron in the form of various inorganic compounds was investigated on the basis of the rapidity and height of hemoglobin response. No satisfactory explanation of the variation in response is offered, but it is suggested that solubility may have some significance and that the valence of the ferric ion is irrelevant.

11. Nutritive Value of the Garbanza Pea. Western Hospital and Nurses Review 11, No. 6 (1928)

The data presented indicate that as a source of protein the garbanza pea is somewhat better than soy bean and approximately equivalent to casein. As a source of vitamin B, it is rich. The urine of rats on the garbanza pea diet was neutral or alkaline whereas the urine of the animals on a casein diet was distinctly on the acid side.

Note: There had been very little other than a chemical analysis previously published concerning the food value of this legume.

12. Some Recent Advances in Vitamin and Mineral Research. Western Hospital and Nurses Review 13, No. 5 (1929)

A scientific survey and review of recent work from various European and American laboratories.

13. Vitamin C Content of Japan Green Tea. J. Am. Diet. Assoc. 5, 28 (1929)

The vitamin C content of infusions of Japan green tea was investigated using guinea pigs and a standard technique as outlined by Sherman. No demonstrable amount of vitamin C was found in any of the samples of Japan green tea tested.

Note: This investigation was instigated by the erroneous advertising issued by the American Japan Green Tea Committee and the publication of results was corroborated the following month by a similar report from the Bureau of Home Economics. After due season the false advertising of the product has apparently ceased.

14. Inorganic Elements of Spinach in Treatment of Nutritional Anemia. Mitchell, H. S. and Miller, L. Proc. Soc. Expt. Biol. Med. 26, 835 (1929)

A preliminary report of the work published later in the Journal of Biological Chemistry.

15. Inorganic Elements of Spinach in the Treatment of Nutritional Anemia. Mitchell, H. S. and Miller, L. J. Biol. Chem. 85, 355 (1929)

A water extract of spinach was fed as a supplement to a milk diet as a curative agent in nutritional anemia in animals. Quantities supplying 0.5 mg. of iron, 0.004 mg of copper and 0.012 mg. of manganese or half that quantity proved to be more potent than the iron-copper or iron-copper-manganese complex of pure salts in the building of hemoglobin. The<sup>at</sup> brought into solution with HCl was found to be more effective than the insoluble form of the same ash. In addition to the above mentioned metals S<sub>2</sub>, Sn, Al, Zn, Sr, Ca, Mg, Na, K and P were found to be present in the ash. The daily iron requirement of a rat was shown to be less than 0.5 mg if properly supplemented.

Note: This work agrees with that of other investigators in general, but is more specific than some reported and shows the value of natural source of minerals.

16. A Note on the Use of Wheat Starch in "Synthetic" Rations. Proc. Soc. Expt. Biol. Med. 27, 874 (1930)

Wheat starch, a by-product of gluten manufacture, has been found to be a satisfactory and economical substitute for corn starch in synthetic rations and it does not require autoclaving to insure its freedom from the antineuritic factor.

Note: Useful information for experimental laboratories.

17. Nutritional Survey in Labrador and Northern Newfoundland. J. Am Diet. Assoc. 6, 29 (1930)

A study was made of dietary conditions among the fisher folk along the coast. Fifty family dietaries were collected from twelve or more different villages and analyzed for nutritive value. Few of the dietaries showed an apparent shortage of total calories. The protein, fat, carbohydrate were in reasonable proportion, starches predominating. The nutritive shortages were chiefly among the minerals and vitamins. Phosphorus and iron were adequate in many cases, but calcium was extremely low resulting in rickets, poor teeth, etc. The deficiency of vitamins was evident both in the food supply and in the wide spread occurrence of deficiency diseases such as night-blindness, beri-beri, rickets and mild scurvy.

Note: An editorial comment in the J.A.M.A. and other abstracts have called attention to this article.

18. Growth and Reproduction in a Lacto-Vegetarian Rat Colony. Bull. B.C. San. Hosp. Clin. 25, 185 (1930)

The lacto-vegetarian diet, composed of whole milk powder, rolled oats, ground whole corn, whole wheat bread crumbs, peanut meal, dried celery, wheat germ, yeast, iodized salt and fresh greens, has been used in this laboratory over a period of 8 years. It has proved not only satisfactory but distinctly advantageous as the colony has shown a marked improvement during that period. Of the recorded matings 90 per cent were fertile, resulting in litters that averaged 8.1 young per litter with an 86-87 per cent survival.
