The concept of the sea was familiar enough to the Hittites in the Old Kingdom. An early rival of Ḫattuša for domination of central Anatolia was Zalpa/Zalpuwa “by the Sea” (Otten 1973; Haas 1977), probably to be identified with İkiztepe near Bafra (Forlanini 1984; Barjamovic 2011: 120 n. 8), and the Telipinu Proclamation (CTH 19) informs us concerning Labarna (1): nu uṭnē ḫarninkiškit nu uṭnē arḫa tarranut n=uş arunaš irḫuš iet, “He destroyed (the enemy) lands and rendered them powerless. He made them borders of the sea.” In later days, the sea was also among the divinized – but hardly personalized – geographic features called upon to witness Hittite treaties (Kestemont 1976). Yet the Black Sea seems to have vanished below the horizon of the later Hittites, while neither the Mediterranean nor the Aegean was regularly visited by the armies or people of Ḫatti prior to the campaigns of Šuppiluliuma I and Muršili II in the later fourteenth century, which incorporated both Syrian Ugarit and the western Anatolian Arzawa lands into the empire. Indeed, outside of the treaty god lists, “the sea” appears in later texts most frequently as a distant location from which a deity must be lured back for worship, or to which evils might be banished (Wilhelm, RIA 8, 4–5). The divinized Sea played next to no role in traditional Hittite religion.

Therefore the central presence in CTH 719 of the Sea-god (Aruna) indicates an origin in the south of Anatolia for this rite, confirmed by the role of the town of Tuwanuwa (classical Tyana, near modern Niğde) (see Text 1.A ii 30’). Furthermore, this fragmentary ritual features many of the same cultic personnel as found in other CTH texts from the south of Anatolia.

* I am pleased to contribute this essay to the memorial volume for Professor Dr. Heinrich Otten, from whom I learned so much about my trade as a student in Marburg, 1975–1977. Abbreviations employed here are those of the Chicago Hittite Dictionary.

2 That is, he conquered territories as far as the sea(s). For composite text see Hoffmann 1984: 12.

3 The Sea as a character in mythological narratives (see Rutherford 2001) is found almost exclusively in tales of foreign (chiefly Hurrian) origin. The exception, CTH 322, of central Anatolian background, is puzzling. See comment on Text 1.B obv. 18’ below.

and deities as CTH 641, “Organisation du culte d’Išḫara”, which deals with the establishment of a cult in Cilician Kizzuwatna.

Lasting at least four days (see Text 1.B obv. 21’), in its truncated form CTH 719 consists primarily of bread offerings and evocatio-rites, but also includes burnt offerings (ambaššeš, Text 1.B §§4’–5’) and an interesting address to Šaušga (Text 2.A §2’). The importance of this ceremony is underlined by the participation of His Majesty himself (Text 1.A ii 29’–30’).

The primary manuscript (Text 1.A) is made up of the pieces KUB 20.1 and KUB 53.30, which cannot, however, be joined indirectly, as suggested by the Mainz Konkordanz. There can be little doubt, however, that these fragments belong together, since they are the only sources in the Boğazköy archives to feature the abbreviated(?) writing UZU.GIG.HLA for ‘liver’. All of the accessible textual material of CTH 719 is written in New Script.

5 Both fragments preserve the right-hand and lower edges and therefore constitute the lower right sections of their (mutually exclusive) respective tablets. (Note also that a line of the obverse runs over onto KUB 53.30 rev. 12.) Perhaps these fragments are portions of a multi-tablet work.

6 KUB 20.1 (Text 1.A) ii 5’, 7’, iii 30, 33; KUB 53.30 (Text 1.B) obv. 3’. I am grateful to Richard Beal, who verified this observation in the files of the Chicago Hittite Dictionary Project.

7 There has been little previous substantive work on this composition. See only Groddek 2004: 1–4 on Text 1.A and Archi 2002: 49 on the ritual in general.

Commentary

Text 1.A ii 5': For the divine epithet mūwānu see CHD L-N 316 and the references there cited.

Text 1.A ii 6': The very likely restorations at the beginning of this line and ii 31’ are the basis for my estimation of available space in other lines of this piece.

Text 1.A ii 11’ff.: The extreme number of erasures in the paragraph seem to indicate that the scribe had some difficulty in compiling – or merely in copying(?) – the offering list here.

Text 1.A ii 20': The Syrian goddess Išḫara, apparently originally at home in Ebla, has been studied extensively by Archi (1993), Archi (2013: 16) and by Prechel (1996).

Text 1.A ii 26’: The deity Ḫu(r)dumana is to be found only in this composition, according to van Gessel 1998: vol. 1, 163, 168.

Text 1.B obv. 18’: The appearance of the Hattic deity Telipinu in this company is surprising, but then again we have lost almost all of the divine names originally present in Text 1.A §2’. Perhaps the use of Telipinu’s rhyton here has something to do with this god’s marriage to the daughter of the Sea-god in CTH 322 (translated in Hoffner 1990: 25–26, no. 6). A hammer also appears in connection with Telipinu at KUB 17.10 i 33’ (CTH 324), where his father the Storm-god is said to have broken GIS NIG GUL-ŠU GIS KAK-ŠU, “his hammer and his wedge,” in a futile attempt to open a city gate while in pursuit of his absconding son.

Text 2.A i 12’ff.: To this address to the goddess compare the Akkadian-language invocation KBo 32.206 rt. col. 7–12²⁸.

URU Rimûš(iya), found only here and in CTH 716 (KBo 2.36 i 5′) among Hittite texts (so RGTC 6, 326; 6/2, 129), is perhaps rather to be read URU Tal-mu-uš-šī-ya; see Sommerfeld, RIA 11, 374.

Text 2.C obv. 7': Note that the phonetic complement -ni here indicates that the name of the Storm-god was read Tarḫun(t) and not Teššup in this text.
